94. The Committee considered that the Committee of Experts' General Survey constitutes a good presentation of the options available for the fixing of minimum wages, the various national practices, the difficulties in application and the solutions for overcoming these difficulties. It showed that the means of fixing minimum wages had been, from the beginning, among the aims of the ILO and that this question had been the subject of international labour standards for a long time. Referring to the long-standing nature of the question, the Employers' members considered that the discussion in the Committee should enable it to be established whether the solutions provided for by these instruments were still the best in the light of present practices and situations. They recalled that the right to a decent minimum wage was recognised in numerous universal or regional instruments. The Workers' members stressed that almost all countries had one or more minimum wage fixing systems, although these were not always used in practice. They considered that the standards relating to minimum wages were still strategic instruments in the struggle against social exclusion and poverty, and that the Conventions on wages were among the priority Conventions, given their importance in a world of full economic and social reconstruction. The Workers' member of Pakistan emphasised the importance of minimum wage fixing in both developing and industrialised countries.

95. The Committee noted that while Conventions Nos. 26 and 99 require the establishment of procedures according to which minimum wages could be set, Convention No. 131 prescribes the actual setting of minimum wages. The Employers' members considered that this requirement explained why Convention No. 131 has only been ratified by a third of the number of States that ratified Convention No. 26.

96. The Workers' members pointed out that many categories of workers (including the young, apprentices, the disabled, home-based, temporary, seasonal or part-time workers) were partially or totally excluded from the application of the Conventions. In any event exclusions should be temporary and re-examined periodically in agreement with workers' and employers' organisations.

97. The Employers' members stated that the abundance of detail in the General Survey might give rise to confusion and they cited as an example the situation in Germany. Minimum wage-fixing procedures in that country were referred to repeatedly in the Survey; however, although legislation existed on this matter, it had not been applied for 40 years. The Government member of Germany recalled that the fixing of minimum wages by the State only had limited significance in his country, except for homeworkers. In Germany, the wages determined by collective agreements were really minimum wages.

The fixing of minimum wages and free collective bargaining

98. The Employers' and Workers' members noted that the level of wages is one of the most important conditions of employment, if not the most important. The Employers' members recalled that the ideal method of setting employment conditions, including wage levels, is to ensure free collective bargaining between the parties directly concerned, with no state intervention. Procedures for establishing minimum wages, according to the philosophy of the Conventions, had to come into play if a free system of setting wages between the parties did not exist.

99. The Employers' members raised the question whether minimum wage fixing interferes in collective bargaining. An answer was given in Article 2 of Convention No. 131, according to which the provisions of the Convention may not contravene the principle of freedom of collective bargaining. However, from a less theoretical point of view, it was noted that where the minimum wage became a widespread standard it took account of freely negotiated wages but, at the same time, had a direct impact on them. A minimum wage that acted as a wage index was in reality a restriction of free collective bargaining, and employers and workers responsible for working conditions could not counter this influence. Repeated references to wages for comparable work or wages for similar work covered by collective agreements could have negative effects on free collective bargaining. It would be preferable, if there is really a need for minimum wages, to refer to wages paid in collective agreements for the same work.

100. The Workers' members were of the view that minimum wage fixing is a fundamental aspect of tripartism and of collective bargaining. In so far as a system based on collective agreements did not directly or indirectly cover all workers, additional machinery for fixing minimum wages had to be established. However, the Workers' members considered that a system based entirely on collective bargaining was only effective if freedom of association, including recourse to collective action and free bargaining, were totally guaranteed.

Level of minimum wages and employment policy

101. The major result that could be expected from minimum wages was, according to the Employers' members, that those involved would be able to lead a decent life. However, the fixing of minimum wages was only one of a vast number of measures which could be taken by States to ensure a dignified existence for their citizens.

102. The Workers' members recalled that minimum wages are often so low that they do not ensure a satisfactory living standard or even cover the basic needs of workers and their families. Wages that were too low had many serious consequences as much for the worker and his or her family as for the enterprises and society in general. Child labour was thus often due to the inadequacy of the parents' wages. In addition, growth of the economy was linked to purchasing power and an equitable redistribution of income, and this affected positively the strengthening of social security funding. The level of minimum wages should be revised regularly so as to compensate monetary erosion, particularly in countries faced with structural adjustment policies or transition to a market economy. According to the Workers' members, such revision should follow consumer prices and the living standards of other social groups so as to avoid having too large differences between groups.

103. For the Employers' members, economic factors listed in Article 3(b) of Convention No. 131 had to be taken into account when setting minimum wages. Application of the Conventions on minimum wages would not be useful for workers if such factors were ignored. The payment of too high minimum wages would result in the loss of jobs, depending on the level of wages and the number of people drawing them. If young workers in apprenticeship and unskilled workers whose production was lower than that of the average worker were entitled to receive the same minimum wage as skilled workers, younger or less skilled workers would have fewer opportunities to find appropriate employment. Jobs only existed to the extent that there was a demand for products and services, and demand was dependent upon the price paid for these products and services. The particularly close link between the level of wages and the number of available jobs was established fact.

104. The Workers' members stated that the fixing of minimum wages has a positive impact on the labour market particularly through eliminating unfair competition by limiting recourse to excessive overtime. The proposition that minimum wages or their balanced increase had negative effects on employment, in particular of young workers, had not been confirmed by serious studies.

105. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom referred to the situation in his country, which denounced Convention No. 26 basing its action on flexibility and the freedom of action necessary to maximise employment opportunities, particularly for the young. He wondered whether this flexibility and freedom of action did not enable one group to exploit another or encourage unfair competition between States. The Workers' member of Pakistan, admitting the importance of providing employment opportunities, considered that it was the responsibility of States to eliminate exploitation and provide reasonable minimum wages. The Workers' members invited the Government of the United Kingdom to re-examine its position and to ratify one of the instruments concerning minimum wage fixing.

106. The Workers' members suggested that the question of the relationship between employment – particularly the employment of young people and low-skilled workers – and minimum wages be the subject of an Office study.

107. In addition, referring to Chapter IV of the General Survey as to the criteria for fixing and adjusting minimum wages, the Employers' members noted that minimum wages could not be set by means of mathematical formulae, and that what was needed was a compromise between what was desirable and what was feasible. There was a danger in establishing a uniform wage structure of the type established by the totally ineffective planned economies. They considered that there had to be a differentiated approach to setting minimum wages.

108. The Workers' members thought the consultations with employers' and workers' organisations on an equal footing provided for in the Conventions insufficient to enable real account to be taken of the views expressed. Sometimes, as shown in certain cases raised by the Committee of Experts, no such consultations took place. The Workers' members emphasised the importance of broad social dialogue in determining the effectiveness of wage policies, employment policies and social policies.

Practical application of the Conventions

109. The Workers' members noted that minimum wages are not always actually paid and workers are not always able to have recourse to efficient procedures to claim the amounts due to them. In their view, access to labour tribunals should be made easier, notably by giving workers the right to defence and assistance by their union, and employers should have to provide pay slips so as to avoid placing an impossible burden of proof on wage-earners. In addition, labour inspection services should be given sufficient human and material resources and effective legal powers to ensure the application of national provisions relating to minimum wages.

110. The Workers' member of Pakistan recalled that the application of Convention No. 99 is of great importance in rural regions particularly where there is migration between rural areas and urban centres. Also with a view to reducing international migration, which often took place to the detriment of workers' interests, it was important to raise the level of minimum wages in developing countries.

111. A large proportion of the reports sent by governments did not contain information which, in the opinion of the Workers' members, is essential. It was important that the Committee of Experts continues to request and receive this information. In addition, the Workers' members considered that the question of paying minimum wages partly in kind had to be re-examined since, contrary to the impression given by a quick reading of the Committee of Experts' report, difficulties of implementation did exist in several sectors (services, agriculture, etc.), including in industrialised countries.

Conclusions

112. The Workers' members' view was that the recent economic and social changes and adjustment processes make minimum wage fixing a strategic instrument in the struggle against poverty and for social justice. They requested governments, in a spirit of social justice and respect for tripartism, to take measures to implement or have effectively applied the instruments on minimum wage fixing. Since the Conventions in question leave plenty of room for national traditions and practices, the Workers' members appealed to member States to ratify them, thus contributing to the establishment or strengthening of a safety net of social protection for the most underprivileged groups.

113. While recognising the existence of a strong demand in many countries for minimum wage fixing, the Employers' members stressed that the systems for fixing minimum wages were an emergency measure, a second-class alternative in a world where free collective bargaining should dominate. In these conditions of free bargaining, the aims of the Conventions on minimum wage fixing would become obsolete.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

114. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would apply the same working methods and criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

115. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

116. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that considerable efforts to fulfil the submission obligation had been made in a number of States, namely: Dominican Republic, Grenada, Malawi, Swaziland.

117. The Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress achieved and expressed the hope that there would be further improvements in States that still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

118. The Committee noted with regret that no indication was available that steps had been taken in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1984 and 1990 by the 70th to 77th Sessions of the Conference to the competent authorities, in the cases of Antigua and Barbuda, Bangladesh, Belize, Jamaica, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Zaire.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

119. In Part B of this report (General questions relating to international labour standards) the Committee has considered amongst other things the fulfilment by States of their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. 13.4 per cent of the reports due had been received by 15 October 1991, the date fixed by the Governing Body (9.8 per cent in 1990). By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received had risen to 69.9, which is the lowest recorded since 1946. Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 76.8 per cent (as compared with 83.7 per cent in June 1991 and 81.9 per cent in June 1990). This year, the Committee of Experts noted that 50 per cent of the reports on Conventions for which information on practical information was requested contained such information, roughly the same as in 1991 (49 per cent), but less than in earlier years (56 per cent in 1990, 63 per cent in 1989). The Committee emphasises the importance of sending practical information, without which it is impossible to know if a Convention is actually being applied. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in appealing to governments to make every effort to include the necessary information in future reports.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

120. The Committee noted with regret that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for two years or more by the following States: Albania, Cambodia, Guinea-Bissau, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Liberia, Madagascar, Papua New Guinea, Seychelles, Sierra Leone.

121. The Committee stresses the special importance of first reports, on which the Committee of Experts bases its first evaluation of compliance with ratified Conventions. It notes that this year there are no cases to which it should draw attention in this respect.

122. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts noted that 38 governments had not communicated replies to most or any of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 328 cases (compared with 299 cases last year and 220 two years ago). The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 11 of the governments concerned had sent replies which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

123. The Committee noted with regret that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1991 from the following countries: Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Barbados, Central African Republic, Congo, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Ireland, Jordan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali, Papua New Guinea, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, United Republic of Tanzania, Venezuela, Zaire; France (Overseas Departments).

124. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Belize (administrative problems); Central African Republic (misunderstanding as to deadlines for reporting); Haiti (military coup d'état); Ireland (inadequate understanding in some departments of the administration); Jordan (related to the current revision of the Labour Code); Lebanon (exceptional circumstances); Lesotho (administrative difficulties due to redeployment of officials because of structural adjustment); Madagascar (administrative difficulties); Papua New Guinea (administrative difficulties); Paraguay (administrative difficulties); Senegal (administrative difficulties); Sierra Leone (lack of human resources, breakdown of organisational machinery); United Republic of Tanzania (continuing administrative restructuring and political changes); Venezuela (delay due to consultations of employers and workers); Yemen (technical and administrative difficulties, especially translations; structural difficulties to do with unification); Zaire (paralysis of the labour administration due to transition to democracy); France (Overseas Departments) (heavy workload due to large numbers of ratifications and declarations of application).

Application of ratified Conventions

125. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. The Committee of Experts listed in paragraph 126 of its report new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 50 such cases, relating to 30 States and four non-metropolitan territories in all regions of the world. Almost 1,950 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

126. At its present session, the Committee was informed of other instances in which measures had recently been or were about to be taken by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the present Committee welcomes them as fresh evidence of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

127. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to various important cases which it had to consider.

Cases of progress

128. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases – including many involving basic human rights – governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee. It considers highlighting these cases a positive approach towards influencing governments to respond to comments of the supervisory bodies. In this respect, it refers to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

Special cases

129. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussions of the case mentioned in the following paragraph, a full record of which appears in Part Two of this report.

130. As regards the application by Sudan of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee noted that the Committee of Experts had not been in a position to consider the situation as the Government had not sent a report. The Committee also noted the oral information given by the Government. It expressed its deep dissatisfaction, taking into account that no progress seemed to have been made since it discussed this case some years ago. It was under the impression that the Government confined itself to a simple denial of slavery existing in the country. In that respect, it felt bound to remind the Government that various United Nations bodies had reported on such cases and that the Conference Committee could not but consider those allegations not to be completely unfounded, as long as the Government did not report in full on the existing situation. It therefore expressed the hope, in the strongest possible terms, that the Government would send in such a report. It felt bound, in view of the very serious matter under discussion on the one hand, and the Government's attitude as mentioned before on the other hand, to set these conclusions in a Special Paragraph of the Report.

131. The Committee trusts that the Government concerned will take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invites it to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in the observance of obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions in question.

Continued failure to implement

132. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiences, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee listed no cases under this heading.

133. The Government of the country to which reference is made in paragraph 130 is invited to supply the relevant report and information to enable the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

134. In 1991, 40 reports were requested under article 19 of the Constitution on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111): the Committee notes that 18 of the 40 reports requested were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further one report since, making 47.5 per cent in all. The Committee notes that 463 of the 710 article 19 reports requested on the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention (No. 26) and Recommendation (No. 30), 1928; the Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention (No. 99) and Recommendation (No. 89), 1951; and the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention (No. 131) and Recommendation (No. 135), 1970, were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further 10 since, making 66.6 per cent in all.

135. The Committee noted with regret that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by the following: Cambodia, Grenada, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen.

Communication of copies of reports to workers' and employers' organisations

136. Once again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organisations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23 (2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

137. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 47 governments which collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussions of their individual cases.

138. However, the Committee regrets that, despite repeated invitations, the governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries: Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Jamaica (concerning Convention No. 81), Liberia, Somalia.

139. The Committee notes with regret that certain States which were not represented at the Conference (Bahamas, Cambodia, Dominica, Grenada, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Saint Lucia, Seychelles), as well as another whose representatives had to leave the Conference before its closure (Guinea-Bissau), were unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It decided to mention the cases of these States in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform them in accordance with the usual practice.

140. The Committee is pleased to confirm the trend referred to in its report last year, towards convergence of thinking as to the universality of standards and the absolute necessity of maintaining and strengthening the effectiveness of the supervisory system. Its discussions take place in a sober and constructive atmosphere. The dialogue which has always been the Committee's watchword continues to extend and deepen. It extends, both as the increase in membership of the Organisation offers the opportunity for more delegations to the Conference to take part in the Committee; and as the give-and-take between the present Committee and the Committee of Experts in the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility intensifies. It deepens, with tripartism in action a clear sign of the democratisation which is the theme of the Director-General's report to the Conference this year, and thanks to the imagination and seriousness which the members of the Committee exhibit in their contributions to the discharge of its functions.

141. This said, complacency has no role to play in the supervision of international labour standards. The Committee is aware of the need to take positive measures to extend the dialogue further, in particular so that all the developing countries as well as new member States participate to the full in the Organisation's standard-setting activities. It is aware too of feelings in various quarters that there are imperfections: in the reporting system, in the question of how Conventions should be interpreted, in the question of how the ILO should go about relating standards to technical cooperation. And it is for this reason that the Committee is greatly encouraged to learn of various initiatives taken recently by the International Labour Office.

142. The Committee believes more than ever in the importance of international labour standards and the tripartite approach in finding practical solutions to pressing problems in the world: in industrialised countries experiencing the social consequences of economic stagnation, as well as in countries undergoing an often unsteady transition to democracy and market economy and, moreover, in developing countries where standards of living and working are so very hard to establish and maintain. A worthy aim and a contribution it might hope to make to the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights is to ensure that the need to improve and protect labour standards stays to the fore.

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

Algeria. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent reports and its responses to the comments of the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 29, 63, 100, 105, 138 and 142.

Cape Verde. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 19, 29, 81, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 118.

Central African Republic. A Government representative declared that his Government had sent a number of reports on ratified Conventions in 1991 and had just submitted six new reports and comments to the Secretariat. As there was certainly a misunderstanding concerning the deadline for submission of documents, the Government would be glad to find ways to fulfil its obligations. In future, the Government will do its utmost to provide regularly and in due course the reports requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members, pointing to the delays in the provisions of replies, thanked the Government representative for the explanations given in that respect. It would certainly be possible to dissipate the misunderstanding concerning the deadlines to be respected; the Government should take the necessary measures to ensure that the replies to the information requested are sent on time in future, because they constitute the basis of the work of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee.

The Employers' members, agreeing with the remarks of the Workers' members, underlined that a dialogue had been going on with the Government for at least ten years in respect of different Conventions; it therefore knows very well the procedures of the ILO and is urged to respect in future its obligations concerning the provision of reports in due time.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands observed that Convention No. 87 was not mentionned as a report to be provided by the Central African Republic, although special paragraphs were adopted concerning this country in 1988 and 1989. As the situation had not significantly changed, he was very surprised that this case could not be discussed in the Conference Committee because no report was requested.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government from which it gathered that, according to the Government, the non-replying on questions put by the Committee of Experts was due to a misunderstanding. The Committee, recalling the history of its concern with the fulfilling by the Government of its obligations vis-à-vis the ILO organs, stressed the necessity to comply with the ILO rules as far as reporting and replying are concerned. It therefore expressed its hope that the Government will do so in the very near future.

Congo. The Government representative stated that his Government recognised the remarks of the Committee of Experts to be well-founded concerning the delay in the transmission of reports as well as the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions adopted by the Conference during the last seven sessions. He assured the members of the Committee that these delays were not due to ill will or to obstruction, but were caused by numerous administrative difficulties which his country was facing for over three years. The technical work was already done, particularly with the help of the ILO regional adviser, and the speaker hoped that his Government would be able to fulfil its constitutional obligations in the coming months.

The Employers' members underlined the importance of the submission of reports in prescribed time-limits which was the first step in the supervisory system. In this case important instruments were concerned : Conventions Nos. 29 and 149 ; moreover, Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the last seven sessions had not been submitted to the competent authorities. They hoped that Congo and other countries which were in the same situation would try better to respect their obligations because, in the opposite case, their participation in the work of the present Committee would always be negative ; this was not a real participation and it was not in the interest of any country. The Employers' members invited countries which were in this situation to do their utmost in order to fulfil their constitutional obligations.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Employers concerning the fundamental importance of the constitutional obligations – the supply of reports and submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities – for a proper functioning of the supervisory system. They reiterated the request made to the Government by the Employers' members, suggesting it to resort eventually to the technical assistance of the Office in order to respect its obligations.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government from which it gathered that the administrative difficulties the Government had met or is meeting have been solved with the help of the ILO. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate sections of its report.

Costa Rica. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 29, 81, 96, 100, 135 and 138.

Ecuador. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided information relating to the first report on Convention No. 153.

El Salvador. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports on Conventions Nos. 105, 107, 159, 160 and the replies to the Committee's comments made on Conventions Nos. 105, 107, 159. In addition, the Government has supplied the reports due on ILO instruments requested under article 19 of the Constitution.

Ghana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report on Convention No. 148.

Guatemala. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 1, 10, 13, 16, 19, 29, 50, 59, 63, 64, 81, 96, 100, 103, 105, 117, 118, 124, 141, 144, 161 and 162.

Guyana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied the replies to the Committee's comments made on Conventions Nos. 81, 100, 129 and 142.

Haiti. A Government representative of Haiti, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, stated that her Government had not been able to respect commitments and to supply reports within the time-limits provided, because of the military coup d'état which had taken place on 30 September 1991. The members of the legitimate Government of Haiti were exiled and living in secrecy.

The Employers' members stated that the reason given by the Government representative was distinguishable from other reasons given in other cases. They took note of the situation and hoped that the Government would quickly be able to exercise its right as the democratic Government which had been elected in Haiti. At this time they hoped that the Government would fulfil its obligations to the ILO. Nevertheless, the case of Haiti should be maintained in the report with the explanations supplied by the Government representative.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of the responses of governments to the comments of the Committee of Experts for the work of the Committee. They understood, as had also been expressed by the Employers' members, the situation with which the present Government was presently confronted. They hoped that the Government would be able to fulfil its obligations once the situation in this country had changed.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government. It understood the difficulties the Government had in replying to the questions put to it by the Committee of Experts on account of the present political situation. It sincerely hoped that the Government would be able to return to the country in the near future and expected it to reply at that time to the questions. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

India. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent its response to the Committee's comments concerning Conventions Nos. 29 and 100.

Ireland. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 16, 23, 27, 29, 32, 53, 62, 63, 69, 73, 74, 105 and 110.

In addition, a Government representative expressed deep regret that his Government had to appear before the present Committee to account for certain failures to respond to observations of the Committee of Experts. The Committee could be assured that these failures had no ulterior motive and were certainly not designed to frustrate the work of the Committee of Experts in any way. They should not in any way be interpreted as an expression of disregard of the work of the supervisory bodies or of the observations of the Committee of Experts. Although his Government had failed to respond to the observations on the application of five Conventions, he recognised fully that dialogue with the Committee of Experts was essential to the supervisory work on the application of standards. The department of the administration of his country which was responsible for the majority of the issues raised by the Committee of Experts had, regrettably, not displayed an adequate understanding of the supervisory work of the ILO. The Government accepted full responsibility for these inadequacies and had already taken measures to deal with these problems. The answers to all the pending questions would be transmitted within a few days. As an immediate measure, the views expressed by the present Committee would be brought to the attention of everyone involved so that these views would be acted upon as necessary.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanations on the shortcomings of the Department in his country responsible for responding to these requests of the Committee of Experts. It was essential that he recognised the importance of providing information and that he assured this Committee that the necessary measures would be taken to this end. One could only insist that this be done shortly.

The Employers' members pointed out that this case showed that developing countries were not the only ones to experience difficulties. As the Government representative indicated, a certain department in his Government's administration was not sufficiently convinced of the importance of these reports. It would thus be appropriate to regret these shortcomings as in the other cases and to invite the Government representative to intervene so that the situation could be redressed.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government representative from which it gathered that the information required under the Constitution would be reaching the ILO within the next few days. The Committee further understood that the Government was fully aware of the importance of complying with its obligations under the ILO Constitution and hoped that the Government would act accordingly. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Jordan. A Government representative presented his apologies to the Committee of Experts for the failure of the Government to reply to its questions at the appropriate time and stated that his Government would fulfil its obligations and reply from now on to all the questions of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members, while thanking the Government for appearing before the Conference Committee, expressed their frustration of not receiving reports and replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts on such important Conventions as Conventiosn Nos. 100, 105, 106, 118, 135 and 142. Noting the assurances of the Government representative that his country would fulfil its obligations in future, the Workers wanted to know the reasons of the failure to reply to the observations of the supervisory bodies.

The Employers' members stressed once again the importance of the obligation to submit reports because it was only on the basis of a written report, and not simply on the verbal answers given by the Government, that the Committee of Experts, as well as the present Committee later on, would be able to examine the questions. This Committee could not deal with the material points raised in the absence of written reports, and therefore member States must fulfill their obligations to send reports. This was particularly important in view of the number of failures to send reports which has risen alarmingly. The Employers urged the Government to comply with its obligations to send written reports. They also wanted to know the reasons for its failure to submit reports and suggested mentioning this case in the appropriate part of the Committee's report.

The Government representative explained that the failure to supply reports was related to the current revision of the Labour Code which dated back to 1960 and had not been amended since. The new draft Labour Code elaborated by all the three parties – government, workers and employers – with the help of the ILO as well as the Arab Labour Organisation, had been put before the Parliament and the Government hoped that by 1 November 1992 the Bill in question would be discussed and adopted by the Parliament. This would affect all the national laws and, once this had been done, the Government would be able to submit the reports requested to the ILO.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It understood that the Government would reply to the different questions and comply with all its obligations under the ILO Constitution. It sincerely hoped that the Government would do so as soon as possible and decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Lebanon. A Government representative noted with appreciation the understanding expressed by the Committee of Experts concerning non-observance of constitutional obligations by Lebanon. Referring to the exceptional circumstances prevailing in the country in the past 16 years posing a major hindrance, she stated that her Government has submitted in 1988 a report which had apparently not reached its final destination due to past events and that a copy of the past reports could be supplied. A new report was being prepared by the Ministry of Labour with additional information, although some administrative difficulties obstructed its earlier achievement. The Ministry had completed examining instruments adopted in the 54th to 77th Sessions with a view to their submission to the competent authority. She hoped to be able to supply information very soon about the formal actions taken in this respect.

The Workers' members recalled the difficulties recognised in the past, and noted that some genuine attempts seemed to have been made. They suggested to note this case in the appropriate part of the report and urged the Government to continue with its efforts, recalling the importance of submitting reports so that the Committee would eventually have the opportunity to discuss cases affecting Lebanon.

The Employers' members also noted that non-fulfilment of the obligations to report was due to the war, the events taking place over a number of years. Stressing the importance of compliance, they remarked that as many as 23 Conventions were concerned and requested the Government to make special efforts to catch up with these reporting obligations.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative which referred to the political difficulties existing in the country. It reminded the Government of the importance of complying with the ILO constitutional rules, and expressed a hope that the Government will do everything reasonably possible to comply with those rules in the very near future. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Lesotho. A Government representative explained the administrative difficulties that delayed reporting, namely that the officers responsible for the reporting exercise had been redeployed elsewhere in view of the structural adjustment. He stated that additional officials had recently been recruited and started preparation of reports which would be submitted soon. He referred to the assistance that the ILO had provided for the Government officials and that his Government would request further assistance for the newly recruited staff.

The Workers' members noted the administrative difficulty referred to by the Government representative and suggested that this information should be noted in the appropriate part of the Committee's report.

The Employers members requested the Government to discharge fully its obligation.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government mentioning technical difficulties as the reason of non-compliance with the rules under the Constitution. The Committee asked the Government to comply with those rules in the very near future and decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on ILO instruments requested under article 19 of the Constitution.

In addition, a Government representative indicated that the blockade imposed on his country had made communication difficult with the ILO. The setting-up of a new technical committee with responsibility for examining the observations of the Committee of Experts had been proposed by the Department of Vocational Training. Replies had been given to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members welcomed the explanations given by the Government representative, which were incidentally of interest in view of paragraph 150 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts. It was difficult to continue a dialogue with governments if they failed to submit their reports to the Committee of Experts.

Madagascar. A Government representative, the Minister of Labour, noted that his Government had carefully taken into account the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the non-supply of reports with respect to certain ratified Conventions. He stated, however, that his Government undertook its obligations seriously with respect to ratified Conventions and, for example, as concerned Convention No. 29 on Forced Labour, had suppressed the obligatory nature of the national service which would from now on be constituted only by volunteers. A detailed report on this Convention would be sent to the Office in the very near future. He assured the Committee that the necessary measures would be taken to send all of the reports due to the Office in the near future. He added that assistance from the Regional Adviser on Standards would be very much appreciated in this regard.

The Workers' members recalled the importance of supplying reports to the Office and welcomed the Government's indication that all efforts would be made to ensure that reports were sent in the very near future. He suggested that the Government might wish to avail itself of technical assistance to overcome its reporting difficulties as recommended in the general part of the Committee of Experts' report.

The Employers' members noted the serious difficulties the Government had in complying with its reporting obligations and supported the recommendation made by the Worker' members.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government from which it undertood that the Government had certain administrative difficulties which prevented it from fulfilling its obligations under the ILO Constitution. It also noted the Government's wish to have the assistance of the ILO with a view to fulfilling its obligations in the future. It hoped that such assistance would enable the Government to fulfil these obligations in the very near future.

Mauritania. A Government representative stated that the direct contacts mission that took place in Mauritania between 27 April and 7 May 1992 attained considerable progress on the points contained in the observations of the Committee of Experts. This was due to, in no small measure, the cooperation and availability of national authorities concerned. He expressed his Government's intention to continue this cooperation with the ILO. In general, they felt the results were positive and they not only helped clarify the nature of the information requested but also helped in the formulation of the concrete measures taken to implement them. This was proof of the Government's will to contribute to the observance of international labour standards. Moreover the creation of new democratic institutions exemplified by a multi-party political system was undoubtedly a favourable factor contributing to the attainment of better solutions to the problems raised on these ILO Conventions and Recommendations. In addition the Government representative explained in detail the measures taken and envisaged in order to meet the requests made by the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 22, 29, 62, 81, 87, 94, 95, 102, 111, 118 and 122. Referring to Convention No. 29 on Forced Labour he stated that, among other things, his country had prohibited and eradicated forced labour well before it attained national and international sovereignty by virtue of the 1963 Labour Code. He further stated that the Constitution of 1991 (as did the 1961 Constitution) guaranteed equality of rights and the 1981 Ordinance that prohibited slavery had as its purpose the eradication of the effects of this outdated practice more than its abolition per se. Finally the Government representative stated that he would transmit, in writing to the secretariat, the information he provided to this Committee to enable the Committee of Experts to examine the case.

The Workers' members noted with interest the information provided by the Government representative on the request made by the Committee of Experts concerning certain Conventions and on the changes made in the country. They expressed the hope that this information as well as a detailed report would be transmitted to the ILO and that the Committee of Experts would examine the case next year. In addition they noted with appreciation the tribute paid by the Government representative to the effectiveness of the direct contacts mission that took place in April of this year which once again proved the importance and utility, to this country and to others, of the assistance of the ILO.

The Employers' members also noted the information on the measures taken or envisaged, as a result of the direct contacts mission, to improve the application of the Conventions in question. At this stage it was not possible to evaluate the results of this mission. Once the Committee of Experts had examined the information so provided, this Committee could then determine if these measures were sufficient. Nevertheless they wished to refer to Convention No. 29 cited by the Government representative and stated that one of the major objectives of the mission was to help solve the problem of slavery in view of the fact that information on this question was always insufficient but that a problem seemed to exist. This was a good illustration that this Committee did not discuss minor details, but very important problems, and in this concrete case the reports requested by the Committee of Experts concerned numerous and complex problems. They hoped to be able to examine these questions in depth in the near future.

A Workers' member of Senegal stated his full agreement with the views expressed by the Workers' and Employers' members. He welcomed, in the name of Senegalese workers, the opening of the border between his country and Mauritania as well as the ongoing negotiations between the two countries. He urged the Committee of Experts to be attentive to the timely supply of reports and to ensure that the Government could, if it so wished, request the technical assistance of the ILO to resolve the problems in question.

The Government representative, underlining the positive results of the direct contacts mission, stated that three decrees were adopted in a period of three weeks which was notable in view of the usual bureaucratic problems his country faced. He also indicated that the measures taken by his Government to put the national legislation and practice in conformity with Convention No. 29 were aimed at removing the effects of the now non-existing practice of forced labour.

The Committee noted with interest the information supplied by the Government representative. It understood that the direct contacts mission which took place in April 1992 had produced positive results and welcomed the measures taken or envisaged by the Government. It expressed the hope that the Government would provide a detailed report to the ILO so that the Committee of Experts could fully examine the case.

Morocco. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 2, 4, 11, 12, 13, 19, 26, 27, 29, 52, 81, 98, 99, 100, 105, 122, 129, 136, 147 and the replies to the Committee's comments made on Conventions Nos. 2, 12, 29, 52, 81, 100, 105 and 122.

Myanmar. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 16, 17, 19, 27, 29, 63, 87 and the replies to the Committee's comments made on Conventions Nos. 17, 29, 63 and 87.

Papua New Guinea. A Government representative stated that his Government had experienced administrative difficulties in complying with its reporting obligations because many of the ratified Conventions entailing observations fall under the competence of other governmental agencies which have not provided the necessary cooperation. The Government is examining at present its legislation in connection with the ratified martitime Conventions and the ILO will be informed of the progress achieved. The same administrative difficulties have also impeded the Government to supply its reports on unratified Convention and Recommendations under article 19, but the speaker assured the Committee that these constitutional obligations will be respected in future. The Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the 70th to 77th Sessions were submitted to the National Executive Council – the highest governmental authority – which has approved them and their subsequent submission for adoption by the national Parliament is but a matter of formality. The speaker concluded that in future his Government would take all the necessary measures to observe its constitutional obligations.

The Employers' members, pointing out that the case of this country had been before this Committee for many years, whether it concerned the obligation to report on the ratified or non-ratified Conventions, the submission to the competent authorities, or the replies to comments of the Committee of Experts, noted that the explanations given were the same as always. Recognising that there were obviously administrative difficulties in a country like Papua New Guinea, the Employers' members inquired if the Office could help this country as regards the obligation to provide reports. While noting the expression of goodwill by the Government, they expressed a certain disappointment.

The Workers' members associated themselves fully with the comments and suggestions of the Employers' members.

The Government representative of Fiji expressed his solidarity with the Government of Papua New Guinea in respedct of the difficulties encountered in supplying reports, pointing out that the ILO has a very active representative in that particular region who was always ready to provide assistance in these matters.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that in August 1990 the Regional Adviser on International Labour Standards visited the country to consult the Government on its obligations towards the ILO. Moreover, at the end of January 1992, the Government was invited to send one or more participants to a training seminar on the ILO standards and procedures which took place in Canberra. Finally, the Rgional Adviser for Asia and the Pacific is ready to go to Papua New Guinea in order to provide all the necessary assistance to the Government if it so desires.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government from which it understood that administrative difficulties prevented the Government to report and to reply to comments, according to the constitutional obligations of the ILO. It understood also that the Government has requested and received technical assistance from the ILO with a view to restructuring its reporting and replying procedures in order that it would be able to fulfil its obligations towards the ILO. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will be able to do it in the very near future. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate sections of its report.

Qatar. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied its reply to the Committee's comments made on Convention No. 81.

Sao Tome and Principe. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 17, 19, 81, and 100.

Senegal. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent its reply to the Committee's comments made on Convention No. 81.

In addition, a Government representative noted that the reports concerning the Conventions for which replies were not made to the comments of the supervisory bodies had been made but for administrative reasons had not yet been communicated to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts. He expressed his Government's regret for not having fulfilled its obligations in this regard and its intention to take the necessary practical measures to ensure that reports would be sent in the future within the prescribed time-limit.

The Workers' members welcomed the Government's indication that the reports had already been written and noted that they were not sent within the prescribed time due to administrative difficulties. They also welcomed the assurances give by the Government that this would not happen again. They urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that reports and replies to the comments made by the supervisory bodies were sent on time in the future, as this information provided the basis for the work of the Committee of Experts and of this Committee.

The Employers' members noted that reference to administrative difficulties concerning compliance with obligations under the ILO Constitution was often made in this Committee. This case concerned seven Conventions upon which no relies had been made. The Government representative however did not explain the type of administrative difficulty which had arisen. They trusted, however, that the difficulties would be overcome and that the Government would supply timely reports in the future.

The Workers' member of Senegal noted the Government's indication concerning the administrative difficulties encountered in complying with its obligations and urges that the Committee of Experts watch carefully to ensure that reports were sent within the prescribed time-limits. This was particularly important in this case in which reports on seven Conventions were due, including Convention No. 29 concerning forced labour. In this regard the speaker referred to the use of military recruits to drive buses during a strike of the transport service. Reports were therefore necessary so that the Committee of Experts could make a full assessment of the extent to which the Convention had been applied.

The Government representative noted that, while Convention No. 81 was listed as one of the Conventions for which replies had not been received, the report for this Convention had indeed been sent. As concerns the other Conventions his Government would take the necessary measures to provide the reports in time.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government attributing the delay in replying to the Committee of Experts' comments to technical difficulties. In view of the attitude of the Government expressing its regret for what had happened and undertaking to comply with the obligations under the Constitution in the future, it firmly hoped that the Government would do so and decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Sierra Leone. A Government representative admitted that his Government had failed to fulfil its obligations concerning the supply of various reports. The main reason for this had been the lack of human resources and the breakdown of the organisational machinery in the Ministry of Labour itself. He noted, however, that, with the help his Government had been receiving from the ILO, everything was being done to restructure the Ministry in order to correct these anomalies. With the technical assistance of the ILO, all these problems would be dealt with and reports submitted at the earliest possible time.

The Employers' members noted hat the Government of Sierra Leone had been quite regularly called before this Committee to explain the non-supply of reports. Today they had before them questions relative to almost all constitutional obligations : reports on ratified Conventions, reports on unratified Conventions, replies to the Committee of Experts' comments and submission to the competent authorities. They stressed that without these reports no real discussion of substance could be held in this Committee. They requested, therefore, that this case be dealt with in strict terms so that the violation of all these reporting obligations be prevented from occurring again.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the statement made by the Employers' members and expressed their concern that the explanations given by the Government were the same as in previous years. They therefore supported the request made by the Employers' members to deal with this case in the strictest terms.

A Workers' member of the United States added that he would like to hear more than good intentions from the Government and requested further information as to the reasons the reporting obligations were not met and the measures that would be taken in the near future to ensure that this lapse was remedied.

The Government representative recalled that the previous Government had not been able to regularise the situation but that, with the change in Government, all possible measures were being taken to comply with its obligations. He noted that an ILO adviser would be visiting the country shortly in order to readjust the structure of the Ministry; another was expected to deal with the Labour Standards Division that will do the work of reporting.

A Workers' member of Senegal indicated his continuing concern for the situation and felt that the Government's placing the responsibility on the civil servant was too easy a way out. He added his concern for the worker representative of Sierra Leone who was conspicuously absent from the Conference.

A Workers' member of Nigeria noted the instability caused in Sierra Leone by the new Government and indicated his concern for the freedom of movement of his trade union colleagues in that country.

The Government representative pointed out that the trade union leaders of his country benefited from complete freedom of movement.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government from which it understood that the Government had asked for technical assistance from the ILO with a view to complying with its different obligations under the ILO Constitution. While it appreciated this information, the Committee recalled that the non-fulfilment of the Government's obligations had been a point of great concern over the last years. It therefore strongly urged the Government to meet its submission, reporting and answering obligations as soon as possible so that the Committee of Experts and this Committee could make a full assessment of the situation. It decided to mention this case in the relevant sections of its report.

United Republic of Tanzania. A Government representative stated that his country was not an exception in the process involving spectacular changes to the present world political climate, which had resulted in constitutional changes. This process had influenced the functioning of the administrative procedures and had resulted in unforeseen difficulties. The Ministry of Labour had been restructured every two to three years; such circumstances had impeded submission to the competent authorities of some reports that had already been prepared, which remained in files and could not be supplied to the ILO within the prescribed time-limits. The Government hoped to be able to overcome these difficulties quickly. It indicated that the Government would supply in the near future the next of the 1986 Workmen's Compensation Decree, which was applicable to Zanzibar.

The Workers' members insisted that the Government should do whatever was necessary to improve the situation, because the reports on the application of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105, whose cases were to be discussed in this Committee, were among those that had not been supplied. The Government also had not sent the report that was due under Article 19. This raised a problem for the supervisory system, and for the functioning of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee.

The Employers' members stated that they shared the opinion of the Workers' members and requested that this case be included in the appropriate part of the report of the Committee.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government representative, which referred to the political changes in the country as an obstacle to answering the questions put and to reporting within the prescribed time. The Government gave assurances that it would comply with the obligations under the ILO Constitution, and the Committee hoped that the Government would do so in the very near future. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Uruguay. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 19, 22, 73, 96, 100, 105, 111, 113, 118, 139, 141, 150, 151 and 154.

Venezuela. A Government representative stated that her Government acknowledged that it was true that the reports that were due had not been supplied or had not responded to all the questions raised. The reason for this was that, as her Government had indicated in a letter addressed to the Director-General of the ILO, consultations with workers and employers had taken place in respect to the preparation of the reports, which had involved a delay. However, given that a representation had been made concerning the non-observance by Venezuela of Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultation relating to international labour standards, her Government considered that it was preferable to engage in such consultations in respect of Conventions Nos. 3, 13, 28, 81, 88, 100 and 141. The Government representative stated that all the reports requested would be supplied by September 1992, taking into account the observations of the Committee.

The Workers' members expressed satisfaction that the Government representative had indicated that it intended to file the required reports. They suggested that in order to respond to the requests, the Government should seek the assistance of the ILO if they had trouble meeting the deadline. They emphasised the absolute necessity of sending reports so that the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee could examine them.

The Employers' members noted that the failure to provide the reports requested was not merely a small instance of neglect which could be overlooked, in view of the large number of Conventions involved. They pointed out that it was exclusively the obligation of the Government to submit reports and to furnish replies, although input from workers and employers could be given.

The Government representative thanked the Workers' spokesperson for his suggestion that the Government request technical assistance from the ILO, and indicated that she would raise this matter with her Ministry at the appropriate time. She pointed out that of 52 Conventions, only 14 had not been reported on in 1992, a number which represented less than half of the Conventions ratified by Venezuela. She reiterated that in order not to violate its obligation under Convention No. 144, her Government had preferred to consult the social partners prior to supplying the report.

The Workers' members hoped that their earlier suggestions would eliminate the confusion between ratified Conventions and consultation with the social partners, and submission of reports by the Government, and that this point would be included in the appropriate category of the Committee's report.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative and understood that the Government had met with difficulties on account of the time that had been taken for tripartite consultation in this matter. It furthermore took note of the Government's undertaking to comply with the ILO rules within the prescribed time for reporting and replying to specific questions, and it therefore hoped the Government would do so at its earliest convenience. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Yemen. A Government representative recalled that his Government had to face many technical and administrative difficulties which made it difficult to comply with this obligation. In particular, the documents sent to his country were not in Arabic and much time was spent translating them. On top of this, the country was being faced with many structural difficulties concerning unification. He assured the Committee that his Government would do everything possible to overcome these difficulties and that all due atention would be given to this matter. The Office would be informed of all measures taken to ensure the fulfilment of the country's obligations and on the developments of the adoption of the unified Labour Code.

The Workers' members welcomed the statement of good intent made by the Government. They suggested that the Government might consider technical assistance to help it to meet its ILO obligations. This case should be mentioned in the appropriate section of this Committee's report.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the Workers' members. They noted that the general surveys based upon the article 19 reports enabled all member States to have a perspective on the application of a particular Convention around the world. The general survey also took note of the reasons countries had given for not ratifying the Convention and the difficulties which were encountered in its implementation. These general surveys were therefore very useful for many countries. They were only as valuable, however, as the information provided by the member States. Only worldwide participation would permit a comprehensive overview of this situation. Information was particularly needed from those countries which had difficulty in implementing or ratifying the Convention. They urged the Government to bear this aspect in mind and to make every effort to submit reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations in the future.

The Government representative noted that technical assistance from the Office would be appreciated particularly considering the difficulties encountered by his Government which prevented it from fulfilling its ILO obligations. He hoped that the Office would take the initiative to propose assistance as soon as possible in this regard.

A representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the practice was that a Government requested technical assistance from the Office and the Standards Department would assure that this was provided. The initiative, however, had to come from the Government as the Office could not impose such assistance.

The Government representative indicated that his Government attached the utmost importance to international labour standards and assured the Committee that he would do everything necessary upon his return to ensure that his country requested technical assistance in the areas most needed. He thanked the Committee for its comments and the Office for its readiness to help.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative attributing the delay to technical and administrative difficulties. It also noted the Government's undertaking to comply in full with the obligations under the ILO Constitution and its request for technical assistance from the Office in this respect. In welcoming that undertaking, the Committee firmly hoped that the Government would fulfil its promises shortly. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 5: Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Bolivia (ratification: 1954). A Government representative of Bolivia, the Minister of Labour, stated that, although the national legislation did not authorise the work of minors under 14 years of age, it permitted apprenticeship in industrial establishments. The applicable legislation is 50 years old. The draft Bill of General Labour Act elaborated with the assistance of the ILO, which entails a major modification of the legislation, is ready to be presented to Parliament. In this Bill, the minimum age of admission to work is fixed at 14 years, which would bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The presentation of the draft Bill to the Parliament was delayed, because the Government wanted to submit it to parties concerned including employers and workers. In this regard, a tripartite seminar was organised, but unfortunately the employers were not present. Because of the fact that it had not been examined in a tripartite manner, processing of the draft Bill was suspended. Since then, contacts were made again with the employers to obtain their views on the draft Bill, which will be sent to Parliament as soon as possible so that it can be discussed in November 1992. The speaker explained the reasons for which children in his country between 12 and 14 years work. The insufficient income of the family and the difficult economic situation obliged children to work. Recently, a committee of the Parliament proposed the introproposed the introduction of a measure aimed to prohibit the work of children under 14 years of age, which received very negative reactions in the society of Bolivia. A child of 12 to 14 years in a developing country like Bolivia is not practically a child, since circumstances oblige them to work. It is exceptional if a child of 15 years has not ever worked. He did not consider that the total prohibition of child labour would bring about better protection of children. He referred to the case of India where a child between 12 and 14 years can work outside of the hours of primary education. As children were obliged to work one way or another, the question of the prohibition of child labour as well as the different ways of ensuring their protection while working should be studied, as total prohibition would not guarantee the protection of children.

The Workers' members stated that whilst they approved of the idea that there should be tripartite discussions on national legislation affecting workers and employers, they would not accept it to be used as an excuse for not bringing laws into conformity with the Convention. A draft Bill was to be submitted to Parliament in November 1992. The Convention had been adopted in 1919, ratified by Bolivia in 1954 and since then no attempt has been made by the Government to conform with all the obligations required by the Convention. Referring to Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention concerning exceptions, the Workers' members considered that, despite the difficulties mentioned by the Government representative which were also encountered in other countries in South America and in the developing countries throughout the world, a firm line had been taken by the Committee regarding the employment of children, and the standards laid down in this long-standing Convention should not in anyway be lessened. There were indeed some arguments for reviewing and tightening the Convention. The Workers' members strongly hoped that the Government would introduce the promised legislation and that next year the Committee would be able to receive a report from the Government which would establish that they were formally in conformity with all articles of the Convention.

The Employers' members noted with pleasure that there were no differences concerning the Convention itself, that the Government was apparently prepared to undertake the necessary correction in national legislation, that a draft had been prepared with the assistance of the ILO and that the matters would shortly be regularised provided Parliament adopted this draft. This formal aspect of the problem was a question of time. The Employers' members remarked that the government representative, however, raised a number of other matters, posing the problem in a broader context, in particular, the problem of complying with the Convention in a country like Bolivia, where in reality children work to keep the family going without an alternative. As concerned the suggestion of the Government representative that the ILO examine these situations on the basis of the facts, the Employers' members believed that this suggestion was not addressed to the present Committee but to the ILO itself. They hoped that the Government would make progress in introducing the draft legislation as intended and also ensuring compliance with the Convention.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the object of a current interdepartmental programme is child labour, a real and preoccupying scourge encountered in many countries in many parts of the world. This interdepartmental project on the work of children, in which the Department of Standards participates, has been put into operation during the present biennium (1992-93) and has the principal objective of protecting those who are working in countries like Bolivia and in some 69 other countries which have ratified this Convention; where the prohibition of child labour is not respected, or where no such prohibition exists.

The Employers' member of Bolivia, observing that the comment of the Committee of Experts covers only the employment of children under 14 years of age as apprentices, recalled that the General Labour Act of 1942 only allows the employment of children as apprentices, the Code of Minors clearly modifies the General Labour Act by clearly prohibiting any work by a minor of 14 years. In Bolivia children work in general on their own account and not in an employment relation. The Bolivian employers are ready to discuss the draft Bill of General Labour Act on a truly tripartite basis. They did not participate in the meeting held by the Government because of its political connotation. They, however, welcomed the Bill and the Bolivian Institute of Entrepreneurial Studies, dependent on the employers, has the intention to organise a seminar open to everybody interested and to the public in order to discuss the Bill.

The Government representative referred to the relations between the work of the present Committee and technical assistance supplied by the ILO, and stated that although, as pointed out by the Workers' members, the elaboration of the draft Bill had taken a long time and had not been approved yet and should be accelerated, the delay was not caused by ill will. Good work has been done even though some errors have been made. The draft Bill elaborated by the State with the assistance of the ILO will be presented to Parliament as soon as possible even if the employers will not have commented on it.

The representative of the Secretary-General, referring again to the interdepartmental project, stated that the budget for this programme amounts to $2,268,602. The objectives of the project entitled "Elimination of child labour" perfectly fit the objective of the Organisation to abolish work of children. Note should also be taken of the International Programme for Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) financed by the Federal Republic of Germany, which is contributing $5 million a year, also with the objective of assisting concrete actions in this field.

The Committee took due note of the explanations that the Government supplied, from which it understood that the Bill to change the labour legislation on the points under discussion is before Parliament, where it will be debated in the autumn of 1992. It also noted the Government's willingness to send the text of the amended law to the ILO as soon as the Bill has been passed. In view of the importance of the Convention, and the many years during which this matter is under discussion, it strongly expressed its hope that the Government will succeed in having the Bill passed and put into practice in the very near future.

Brazil (ratification: 1934). A Government representative, after referring to the discussions that took place in the Committee in the past regarding Convention No. 5, reiterated the notion of apprenticeship provided in the Federal Constitution of Brazil of 1988, in Act No. 8069 of 13 July 1990 which defines the status of children and young persons and other legislation such as Decree No. 31546 of 1952. The apprenticeship contract submitted by the National Service of Industrial Apprenticeship (SENAI) applies only to children more than 14 years and establishes work relation under Decree No. 31456. Besides, socio-educational apprenticeship is created by Act No. 8069. In virtue of the Constitution, the status of children and young persons cover the technical and vocational education of children from 12 to 14 years outside the work relationship. The status of children and young persons is not in contradiction with the Convention because it establishes a clear distinction between the activities exercised by children aged 14 years or more who engage in work, and the activities of children between 12 and 14 years who undergo the education, in accordance with the legislation in the field of education. This way of apprenticeship is established in the framework of education and training, opening for the beneficiaries the access to labour markets only from 14 years under the work relationship. In order to overcome certain difficulties of interpretation, it was proposed to ratify Convention No. 138 on minimum age, but Parliament rejected the proposal of ratification. In addition to the judicial consideration, it should be noted the work of children under 14 years of age is a reality, in particular amongst the poorest population where the children's earnings are essential for the subsistence of the family. This situation could not be corrected by decrees, laws or conventions. Brazil has faced the structural adjustment of its economy which had negative consequences on employment and wages. The Government, as well as society, are conscious that there is a social debt to be paid more than external debts. Facing this serious problem, the Government has taken such measures as follows:

- in 1991, the inspection service covered 421,067 children between 14 and 18 years at work;
- the "Minha Gente" (My People) project to which the Committee of Experts refers is a concrete reality today. During this year, 300 centres of assistance for children were established within the framework of a plan to construct 3,000 such centres by 1995; amounting to US$1 million per unit, this programme will benefit 5 million children and their families;
- a Memorandum of Agreement has been signed between the Minister of Labour of Brazil and the Director-General of the ILO concerning the inclusion of Brazil in the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). In the framework of this programme, Brazil submits to the ILO more than 20 projects of cooperation which amount to almost US$4.7 million. Upon the request of the Government, such projects will be elaborated by the workers' and employers' organisations and non-governmental organisations which are active in the field of child labour;
- the Minister requested further assistance and cooperation of the ILO to deal with the question of child labour;
- the 26 governors of all the states of Brazil recently met in Brasilia to discuss the application of advice on the rights of children and young persons in their respectives states, in the framework of an awareness campaign for society in general and for employers concerning in particular the placing of children into the labour market in conformity with the status of children and young persons. The transfer of financial resources from the federal Government to states and municipalities is done in law and practice through government boards. The Government was open to dialogue and to constructive cooperation with anybody who has legitimate interest in the question of child labour and who is ready to collaborate in this sense.

The Employers' members remarked that it was the fifth year that the Committee discussed this problem and there were certain contradictions from previous years on which clarification would be required. Two problems were noted in this case: the first concerning Article 2 the Convention under which children under the age of 14 cannot be employed or work in any establishments covered by the Convention, and Article 3 providing for an exception as regards work done by children in technical schools. The Government representative had said that the apprenticeships that are contemplated in Brazilian law apply to persons over 14 years old, while in 1990 the Government of Brazil stated that children under 14 may not work in industry unless it is a technical undertaking supervised by the public authority. The Government representative should clarify this point, since such training taking place in an enterprise could not be understood as a school. The second problem is that there are a large number of children between the ages of 6 and 14 who are employed in various industries, clearly in violation of the Convention and the law in Brazil. The Government representative today mentioned that 400,000 children were covered by inspection visits and the planned increase in the number of inspection centres form 300 to 3,000. The Committee of Experts however notes in its report on the application of Convention No. 81 that the activities of the labour inspectorate have decreased and that a number of relevant posts have been abolished. The Employers' members considered it better to look also at the application of Convention No. 81. Concerning Convention No. 138, which deals with the minimum age in a broader way, its ratification would mean undertaking much more extensive requirements than those of Convention No. 5, which has a narrower range of industries and obligations. Recalling that this has been a long-standing case, the Employers' members concluded by urging expeditious handling of this case by the Government.

The Workers' members stated that as to the allegations that large numbers of children between the ages of 6 and 14 years were employed in various industries, the Committee of Experts noted some attempts by the Government to control the situation by such means as labour inspection, campaigns on the matter, and discussions with the ILO. The point to be dealt with concerned section 1 of Decree No. 31546 of 1952 which allowed children to work in contradiction with the Convention. As the Employers' members pointed out, there is an exception under Article 3 of the Convention as to work done in technical schools, but even then it has to be under close supervision by the public authorities. The Workers' members did not see a problem about the interpretation of the Convention in this regard, and emphasised that apprentices under the age of 14 cannot work even if it is vocational work. The Committee of Experts has been consistent on this point over the years. The Workers' members therefore requested the Government representative to clarify whether the Government intends to amend section 1 of the Decree of 1952 concerning apprentices. Recognising the difficulties in implementation, as was remarked by the Employers' members regarding the case of Bolivia, the Workers' members pointed out that the legislation itself needed to be changed before talking about implementation. They noted that the laws of Brazil, and particularly this Decree of 1952, were not in conformity with the Convention, and requested information as to when the legislation was going to be changed.

The representative of the Secretary-General referred to an interdepartmental project on the promotion of employment and the structural adjustment set forth during the biennium 1992-93 in which it is specifically mentioned that the ILO should endeavour to ensure that international labour standards of all kinds and especially those concerning employment, human rights, tripartite consultation, freedom of association and collective bargaining remain inseparable from the adjustment policies.

A Government member of Germany noted that the Convention was ratified in 1934 and that Decree No. 31546 on vocational training adopted in 1952. He referred to two systems of vocational training, one taking place only in the training schools and the other, which is called the dual system, taking place in vocational schools and in enterprises. The latter has made excellent results particularly in his country. Observing that difficulties in the application of the Convention appeared following the adoption of the Decree of 1952 and the introduction of the dual system, the speaker wondered if the Government should extend the school age beyond 14 years so as to respect the Convention or denounce it.

A Workers' member of France stated that the Committee of Experts referred to the allegations that a large number of children between 6 and 14 years of age were employed in various industries, in violation of the relevant legislation. As regards the necessity to modify the legislation which authorises the apprentices to work, it should first be questioned whether it is precisely the impossibility to offer children the access to apprenticeship that oblige children to work not only at very young ages between 6 and 14 but in the conditions of exploitation where they live in groups, get beaten, ill-treated or even killed. The speaker wondered if, given development of the economic situation conditioned by highly political phenomena, the modification of the legislation would be sufficient to change the situation.

A Government member of Argentina considered that the prohibition of the work of children should not be affected by particular economic situations. The prohibition aims at the protection of the child. A child should not work because physically incapable of doing so : a child is growing and has to prepare to reach maturity. The prohibition of the work of children is not sufficient in itself, and has to be accompanied by policies of promotion; the State should endeavour to ensure that children are correctly nourished, educated and that they will not work to supplement the income of the parents. The speaker also referred to the action by UNICEF for children.

A Workers' member of Pakistan remarked that the question had not only legal but also economic and social aspects. He stated that the State has the responsibility to make more economic and social input so as to alleviate suffering of children and that education and training is very meaningful, particularly in the developing countries. He expressed a hope that more economic and social measures would also be taken to eliminate suffering and also to enforce legislation on the subject.

The Government representative made the following clarifications : the centres for assistance of children were not the centres of inspection; the labour inspectors were allocated to other posts by administrative measures but they were reintegrated and returned to their activities. While the present Committee has discussed the case of the application of the Convention in Brazil five times, it should be noted that the new federal Constitution of Brazil is only dated 1988 and that the Act on the status of children and young persons was promulgated subsequently. Such new texts are now in force and complement the earlier provisions. The draft of Act No. 2018 of 1991 submitted to Parliament provides for a special regime of introduction of young persons to work. An interministerial committee engages in the adaptation of the whole of the labour legislation of Brazil and another committee chaired by the President of Brazil, the Committee on Deregulation, has already reviewed more than 100,000 decrees or laws going back to the proclamation of the Republic over 100 years ago; efforts are also made for deregulation and simplification. The reform of the whole of the labour legislation is in process.

The Employers' members stated that the Government representative was avoiding the issue of Decree No. 31546 of 1952. Noting the statement by the Government representative that apprenticeships apply to persons over 14 years old, he asked again whether the Decree encompasses persons under 14 years old.

The Workers' members expressed concern about the reply given by the Government representative who indicated that attempts were being made by National Congress, in an Interdepartmental Commission chaired by the President of Brazil to work on the 100,000 decrees which exist. If this were so then the issues which concerned the Committee might have to await the birth of the twenty-first century before they were dealt with. There are two issues: firstly, a continuing concern about the position of children in Brazil, regarding which some measures have been noted such as campaigns and consultation with the ILO. Information on violations concerning the work of minors recorded y the Labour Inspectorate would help in assessing what the Government has been doing regarding this matter; secondly, the specific question respecting the Decree referred to by the Committee of Experts whether it still exists and if so whether it will be changed. As to labour inspections, the Workers' members further hoped to receive the number of prosecutions undertaken and also the sanctions imposed, such as fines, which would give some idea of the way in which the Government is in fact pursuing its own will.

A Workers' member of Greece expressed his indignation that this Committee should discuss these problems with a strictly legal approach while the situation of children in many countries, and in Brazil in particular, is intolerable for every civilised being. It is deplorable to have to discuss this problem for five years and not to be able to note at present any real progress in the protection of childhood; it is not even guaranteed that this protection exists on paper. Recalling that this Committee is not a tribunal, the speaker expressed his indignation with the situation of children in Brazil, which is recognised not only in the report of teh Committee of Experts but also in the international media. This is why, either the Government representative of Brazil would give precise information and guarantees concerning measures taken or to be taken in the very near future, or the present Committee has to take an extremely severe position on the question of the protection of children.

The Workers' member of the United States associated himself with the comments made by the previous speakers pointing out the extreme seriousness of this problem, underlined by the Director-General himself, and invited the Government representative to take home to his Government the overriding importance of the problem for the present Committee.

The Government representative stated that the Decree on Apprenticeship mentioned by the Employers concerned only the age group from 14 to 18 years of age and that it was in conformity with the labour legislation in force in Brazil; the provisions on the social and educational aspects of apprenticeship, contained in the Constitution and in the legislative texts concerning children and youngsters, covered children of 12 to 14 years in conformity with the law applicable to education. The speaker recalled that he has mentioned only some of the concrete measures taken by his Government, and stated that LegislativeDecree No. 2018 settles the question of the revision of Decree No. 31548. He indicated that no general comments should be made on the intentions of governments.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government which contained, it seems, clarification on points mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report. It understood that the Government is in the process of reviewing very many laws, including the whole of the labour legislation, but it regretted not to have heard a clear statement on the points referred to in the report. The Committee expressed its deep concern about the situation on child labour in the country which has been a subject under discussion in the Committee for the past four years and still did not seem to be in conformity with the Convention. It therefore very strongly urged the Government to inform the ILO in the near future about steps taken to bring the situation into conformity with international labour standards.

Singapore (ratification: 1965). A Government representative stated that section 4 of the Employment of Children and Young Persons Regulations, 1976, provides that children between the age of 12 and 14 years can be employed in an industrial undertaking only with the written permission of the Commissioner for Labour, which he has never granted in practice. The number of such applications was 22 in 1988, 34 in 1989, 12 in 1990, 11 in 1991 and one up to June 1992. The labour legislation provides sufficient safeguards to check abuses in the employment of children under 14 years, especially in industrial undertakings. The incidence of children taking up permanent employment is very low in Singapore and the abuses are almost non-existent ; the Ministry of Labour has never received a complaint in that respect. The amelioration of economic conditions and smaller family structures have meant that there is no need for children to enter the job market prematurely ; moreover, parents want their children to stay on in the education system to be fully prepared for the aspirations of a growing economy. None the less, the Government monitors the situation very closely to ensure that there are no abuses, and it will review the law with the view to improve its conformity with the Convention. The Government will keep the present Committee informed of the outcome of this review when it has been finalised.

The Employers' members stated that the Government representative essentially repeated what he had said in this respect in 1987. If in practice the legislation of Singapore complied with the requirements of the Convention, then there is no employment of children under the age of 14 and it would be a simple matter to change the law. The Government representative declares today that it will re-examine the situation, but it seems that this declaration was already made in 1987. The Government should go ahead now and introduce the necessary changes into the law which would bring the legislation and practice into conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that this question has been discussed for many years and that the real problem lies in the fact that the legislation does not prohibit the employment of children under 14 years of age in industrial undertakings. This Convention is a priority instrument which requires a global, determined and, above all, unequivocal approach. Technical training institutions are not enterprises, the ratification of Convention No. 138 would permit a resolution of this problem. The Workers would not accept that the Government restricts itself to declaring that it will modify the provisions in question "if the need arises", as mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts. This type of attitude on the part of the Government leads one to think that the Government's commitment to suppress child labour is not very convincing. Singapore does not suffer from lack of resources, nor it it confronted with administrative difficulties. The Government must change its legislation in respect of the minimum age to bring the law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative confirmed that his Government would revise the law in order to bring its provisions in conformity with the Convention and assured the present Committee that its observations would be brought to the attention of the Government, which might want to provide a written reply.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government from which it gathered that the Government will review the Employment of Children and Young Persons Regulations of 1976. It understood also that the Government would welcome a mission on behalf of the ILO on these questions. The Committee expressed the strong hope that the Government will review the law in the very near future and will send the texts to the ILO as soon as possible, in order that the Committee may assess the situation at one of its next sessions.

Malaysia (ratification: 1960). A Government representative indicated that the Trade Unions Act, 1959, governed the formation and functioning of trade unions and applied to all workers employed under contracts of service in which an employee-employer relastionship existed. Workers who worked for agricultural enterprises were also able to form trade unions. However, agricultural workers who worked on their own behalf were free to form or to join with associations to protect their interests under the Societies Act, 1966, and the Cooperatives Act, 1948. There was no restriction on their right of association and combination. The Government provided, through the Federal Rural Development Authority (FELDA), the Small Rubber Industries Development Authority (RISDA), the Federal Rural Consolidation and Rehabilitation Authority (FELCRA), the Peasants Organisations Authority (FOA) and various other agencies, the necessary support services, loans, subsidies and training in order to improve the income and the welfare or peasants. In addition, the agricultural products market were the recipients of assistance from the Federal Agricultural Marketing Authority (FAMA). The Government representative indicated that there were presently 19 associations and 681 cooperatives representing the majority of the country's agricultural workers.

The Workers' members expressed regret that, according to information given by the Government representative, only agricultural workers engaged on plantations enjoyed the right to form a trade union. Moreover, it appeared that the Government did not intend to change its position. They emphasised that, as the Committee of Experts had reiterated in its report, all persons engaged in agriculture, including self-employed workers, must have the right to organise. It therefore was not sufficient to provide the right to join cooperatives in national legislation. The position of the Government was unacceptable in so far as it was contrarty to the most fundamental right of workers and, in a certain manner, contrary to the universal application of standards. In view of the fact that it was not the first time that this matter was raised, the Workers' members hoped that the conclusions of the Committee would take this into account, and that they would examine this matter more closely in the following year when there would be a particular emphasis on freedom of association. Nevertheless, if it was necessary for the Committee to note again that no progress had been made, they would ask that they consider its conclusions differently.

The Employers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts' report indicated that only workers who had an employment contract and who worked for plantations had the right to form trade unions. Further, it was not a matter of referring to the length of the contract or to the size of the enterprise. They stated that freedom of association must be guaranteed whether it involved workers engaged on their own behalf or pursuant to an employment contract. Although they recognised that a country like Malaysia could encounter certain difficulties in terms of law and practice, the Employers' members stated that they were of the opinion that the Government should reflect upon and revise its position in order to take measures to bring the provisions into conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Malaysia hoped that the Government would amend its legislation to eliminate the prohibition of the formation of trade unions by workers other than those on plantations.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands indicated that in reading the provisional record of the report of last year's Committee attentively, he noted that the information provided by the Government this year was exactly the same, and points of view expressed by the Employers' and Workers' members were also the same. He asked the Government representative what, in his view, was the purpose and the usefulness of the debate.

The Government representative reiterated its earlier statement that there was no restriction on the right of workers to form trade unions as long as they were employed under an employment contract. He said that the purpose of a trade union was to negotiate with employers on behalf of its members. In view of the present circumstances in Malaysia and taking into account its degree of development, farmers who work on their own behalf are their own employers. As a result it did not make sense to accept that they could form trade unions, because they had nobody with which to negotiate. In response to the question of the Workers' member of the Netherlands, the Government representative recalled the contents of his previous statement.

The Employers' members emphasised that their intervention of last year regarding this matter was different from that which they had just made. In reference to the position of the Government, they stated that it was necessary to take measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. Finally, they recalled that certain cases examined by the Committee sometimes required ten or more years until progress was noted. In other cases such a result was achieved much more quickly.

The Government representative indicated, in response to the Workers' members, that the goal or the utility of the current discussion was to clarify and explain the position of his Government, taking into consideration the circumstances in his country, so that it would be better understood.

The Committee noted with regret the information given by the Government. It recalled discussing this matter at earlier sessions and felt that no progress had been made. It therefore urged the Government to comply with the suggestions the Committee of Experts made in their report and to amend the legislation existing in the country as soon as possible. It hoped that the Government would send a full report on these amendments to the ILO in the very near future.

Convention No. 12: Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture), 1921

Malaysia (ratification: 1961). A Government representative informed the Committee that the Social Security Act, 1969, had been substantially amended. These amendments, which entered into force on 21 February 1992, concerned the extension of employment insurance to cover commuting accidents resulting in injury or death of a worker while travelling on a route between his residence and place of work; while travelling in connection with his employment; and while travelling from his place of work to where he has his meal during an authorised recess. These amendments also concerned the reduction of the qualifying period for eligibility for disability pensions from 36 to 24 months, and relaxation of the dependency condtitions pertaining to compensation for dependants of insured workers. He also noted that, effective 1 July 1992, coverage under the Social Security Act, 1969, would be extended to include workers earning up to 2,000 Malaysian dollars a month (the previous ceiling was 1,000 Malaysian dollars), and all employers irrespective of the number of their staff (this scheme formerly covered only employers having five or more employees). Coverage would also be extended to all agricultural workers and those employed principally for the purpose of catching fish in maritime waters. He said that further data and other necessary statistics would be supplied to the ILO in the next report.

The Workers' members noted that direct requests had been made to the Government on the application of this Convention for nearly 20 years, and that the Committee of Experts had made observations on this case since 1982. Since 1982, the Committee of Experts was able to indicate in its reports that progress had been made regarding the extension of the application of agricultural workers' insurance. There had been comments made, by the trade union organisation, as mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report, and last year this case was discussed. They expressed satisfaction that there had been amendments that would enter into force as of 1 July 1992, as had been announced in the Government0s report of last February. They believed that it was important for the Government to supply the texts of the amendments to the Office so that they might be examined by the Committee of Experts to determine whether there remained other exclusions, or whether the legislation was in conformity with the Convention. It was also emphasised that the Government should indicate in its report the measures that were necessary for an effective application of the new legislation.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had in the past occasionally referred to this matter in their reports, but last year was the first year that it had been dealt with the Conference Committee, at which time it had observed that insurance was provided in the agricultural sector in too selective a manner and excluded large parts of this sector. They noted that there had been substantial amendments made, which provided a good example of the effectiveness of the work of the Committee. Although they said that considerable extension of the scope of the insurance was an interesting new development, in their view it was important that the next government report indicate whether this opportunity was made use of, which persons were affected and how the new legislation was implemented, as there remained the possibility that certain persons might be excluded. They were pleased that the Government representative had said that such details and statistics would be provided in the next government report.

The Committee noted with interest the information given by the Government representative. It was under the impression that progress was being made on the subject-matter in the direction the Committee of Experts had suggested. It understood that the legislation had been amended and noted the Government's willingness to send the new text and other relevant documentation to the ILO in the near future, and it hoped to be able to conclude that the legislation was in complete conformity with the Convention at one of its next sessions.

Convention No. 17: Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925

Colombia (ratification: 1933). The Government communicated the following information:

The Government, following the conclusions of the Committee on Social Security, will submit to the Congress a draft law to reform the existing system.

As regards various Articles of the Convention, the Government indicates the following:

Article 2. Concerning limitations related to the non-application of the compensation for occupational accidents, the corresponding provisions were abandoned in practice taking into account that, due to the economic factors (inflation), there are no enterprises with less than 50,000 Colombian pesos of registered capital.

Article 5. Under sections 23, 60, 61, 62 and following regulatory Decree No. 1848 of 1969, a public official who suffers from temporary or permanent invalidity due to an occupational accident has a right to receive a pension which, in terms of the Convention, corresponds to periodical payments. The articles in question provide:

Section 23: 1. In case of permanent partial incapacity a public official has a right to compensation proportional to the degree of incapacity which is determined on the basis of the salary received and the amount of which should not be less than one month's salary nor superior to 23 months of salary. (...)

2. In case of permanent total incapacity or great invalidity, the employee has a right to an invalidity pension regulated in Title XII (section 23).

Section 60 provides that every public official who suffers temporary or permanent invalidity has a right to receive an invalidity pension.

Section 61 further indicates that for the effects of the invalidity pension, a public official will be considered an invalid if he for whatever reason has lost in percentage not less than 75 per cent of his working capacity, provided that such loss is not the result of an intentional act, commission of a grave fault, or an unjustified and grave violation of safety regulations.

Article 7. Victims of occupational accidents who become incapacitated and need the constant help of another person are considered by the Colombian legislation as falling under the category of "great invalidity" which provides for special treatment to the extent that section 21 of Decree No. 3170 of 1964 stipulates that a worker has a right, in these circumstances, to receive a pension (rent) equivalent to 85 per cent of a basic monthly salary, which is higher than that for the permanent absolute incapacity fixed at 70 per cent.

Article 10. Section 10 of Decree No. 3224 of 1981 provides: a worker covered by the social security who is a victim of an occupational accident or suffers from an occupational disease has a right: (a) to the necessary medical, surgical, hospital and pharmaceutical aid as well as to the other necessary therapeutic means (without any other limit but that related to the duration of contingency); (b) to the supply, repair and renewal of the orthopaedic appliances and protheses the use of which is considered to be necessary due to the injury received and under the conditions established by special regulations.

As concerns the National Fund for Social Protection which covers social security for the employees and workers of the State, section 25 of resolution No. 2640 of 1984 stipulates: a member affected by a disease of occupational or non-occupational origin or by an occupational accident has a right to have the National Fund for Social Protection provide him with the corresponding medical help without any limitation and for all the time which will be necessary, including the supply of the orthopaedic appliances, protheses and surgical measures.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, referred to the observation of the Committee of Experts where it requested that steps be taken to amend the legislation on workmen's compensation of industrial accidents in order to bring the legislation in question fully into line with the with the Convention. With respect to Article 2 of the Convention, the provisions mentioned in the observation had been repealed in practice. It was indeed impossible to establish enterprises with a capital which was less than 50,000 Colombian pesos (around US $75). With regard to the points related to the application of Article 5 of the Convention, the Committee of Experts should again examine this question in the light of the provisions of the regulatory Decree No. 1848 of 1969 mentioned by the Government in its written communication and which clarifies Decree No. 3135 of 1968. As concerns the application fo Article 7 of the Convention, it was appropriate to add that victims of occupational accidents who became incapacitated and who needed the constant help of another person were considered by the Colombian legislation as falling under the category of "great invalidity". These persons had the right to receive a special pension which was higher than that granted in the case of permanent absolute incapacity.

As regards Article 10 of the Convention, the provisions of Decree No. 3224 of 1981 and of Resolution 2640 of 1984 provided for services of medical assistance to workers in the private and public sectors as well as the supply of prostheses and orthopaedic appliances. It would be appropriate to take note of these legislative texts to which the Committee of Experts made no reference in its observation. In the event where the slightest divergence subsisted between the legislation and practice and the Convention, the Government was ready to examine the question and to put proposals before Congress with a view to amending the relevant laws. With regard to point 2 of the observation, the Government shared the concern felt by the Committee of Experts as to the number of people covered by the social security scheme. This was a problem that occurred in both developed and developing countries as was demonstrated in the tripartite seminar organised by the ILO in 1991 on the future of social security in industrialised countries. The constituents showed themselves to be conscious of this problem by providing in the Constitution that the State of Colombia should extend social security coverage by progressive stages. Social security coverage, both territorially as well as in terms of the number of persons covered, could be extended.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for this information but regretted that it had not been made available to the Committee of Experts. With respect to Article 2 of the Convention, the Government maintained that in practice it complied with the requirements of the Convention. It should thus not be a problem to ensure that the legislation itself was brought into line with the Convention. With respect to Article 5, the Government cited a different Decree to that relied upon by the Committee of Experts and it would be appropriate to submit this Decree to the Experts for their review. With respect to Article 7, which concerned additional compensation to victims of industrial accidents, it appeared that some compensation was provided for by Decree No. 3170 and it would be appropriate to submit this text as well to the Committee of Experts for review. The application of Article 9 of the Convention was not referred to either in the written or the oral presentation of the Government representative. It would be useful if he explained the way in which his Government complied with this provision. As for Article 10, the Government representative once again cited a different Decree to that which was referred to by the Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts in its report also asked for some statistical information with respect to the number of persons who were actually protected by the workmen's compensation laws. This number appeared to be quite low but, based on the new information that the Conference Committee had received, this figure could in fact be substantially higher and this new information should be provided to the Committee of Experts. Generally, the Experts needed to study this legislation attentively so that this Committee could be in a better position in the future to determine whether the Government of Colombia had met the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' members indicated concern about ensuring the extension of the Social Security Scheme to the whole of the population as soon as possible because the Committee of Experts themselves wanted detailed information on the progress achieved, with a view to progressively extending this Scheme throughout the national territories. Current figures showed that about 31 per cent of the active population was covered by the Scheme but that a higher figure would be noted and appreciated by this Committee. Moreover, the Committee of Experts had indicated that in making an assessment of whether a government had fulfilled the commitments it had entered into concerning the Conventions which it had ratified, it was not only the laws that mattered but that statistical information was needed as well. The Government representative was invited to submit such information not only to this Committee but also to the Committee of Experts in order to make such an assessment.

A Workers' member from Greece added that the Committee of Experts had very clearly established that the Colombian legislation was not in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Government representative should clearly indicate if his Government intended to amend this legislation which seem to be a relatively simple procedure. It was sad to have to discuss the application of a Convention relating to accidents at work since this was a problem which should first be dealt with by preventive measures. Governments should, for their part, apply legislation which was in conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative specified that, in the event that the examination of the new observations of the Committee of Experts revealed the need to revise the current legislation, his Government would be ready to put the matter before Congress which would then have the last word in accordance with the democratic system prevailing in his country.

A Workers' member from France, recalling that the Committee of Experts had indicated that only 31.2 per cent of the active population was covered by social security, considered that this low percentage required a more specific explanation from the Government representative, particularly regarding practical measures which could be taken to this end.

The Government representative confirmed his previous explanation that an eventual legislative reform would not relate to an extension of the social security coverage but to the provisions relating to Articles 2, 5, 7, 9 and 10 of the Convention. The coverage of the social security scheme depended on available funds. The social security scheme was financed by contributions from employers and workers and the State faced many problems in order to comply with its legal obligations in the matter. The assistance of ILO experts would be welcome, as well as, as was suggested by the Director-General of the ILO, international assistance in this domain. His country was absolutely prepared to receive suggestions and ILO assistance in order to obtain the resources that were indispensable in order to extend social security coverage.

The Committee took due note of the information supplied by the Government representative from which it gathered that new documents were available on the points raised by the Committee of Experts. It trusted that the Government would provide this information to the Experts very soon. In view of its concern over a social security scheme not covering all the workers and not being extended to the whole national territory, it expressed its firm hope that it would find the situation in complete conformity with the Convention at one of its next sessions.

Convention No. 22: Seamen's Articles of Agreement, 1926

Pakistan (ratification: 1932). A Government representative indicated that the Government had started to take measures to apply the Convention: a draft amendment of the Merchant Shipping Act had been prepared and interdepartmental and interministerial consultations had taken place; the draft legislation takes into account the view of the Committee of Experts and would soon be put to the National Assembly after the Cabinet's approval. His Government would report for the period ending 30 June 1933, as requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members recalled that the failure to apply legislation to seamen engaged in ports outside Pakistan had been discussed since 1981 without satisfactory response, and noted that the Government representative confirmed that the draft had not been approved. They wished to know the reason why there had been no progress. As regards the second point on which the Government stated, according to the Committee of Experts' report, that the provisions had been amended, they pointed out the ambiguity of the situation and requested that the text which the Government mentioned be sent to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' member in requesting the draft legislation, before enactment. They asked the Government representative whether there was some political difficulty or impediment, and if not, when could enactement be expected.

The Workers' member of Pakistan urged not only that a copy of the draft legislation should be sent to the ILO, but also that the Bill be sent to the Cabinet and passed before the Parliament, so that the gap between national law and the requirements of the Convention would be remedied.

The Government representative expressed a hope that the legislation would be adopted by 30 June 1993. He stated that there was no political difficulty with regard to the matter. Concerning the request that a copy of the draft legislation be sent to the ILO, he explained that the draft legislation, although it had taken note of the comments, was a secret document under the rules of business of the Government and remained strictly in the custody of the Cabinet, and that it might not be possible to send a copy of the draft legislation. He added that the delay in enactment had been caused by several elections in the country and changes of the Government which entailed administrative difficulties in taking up the matter.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It understood that the Bill had been drafted to amend the existing legislation, which would be brought before Parliament soon. In view of the fact that the Committee has been discussing the subject-matter on various prior occasions, it urged the Government to take the necessary steps in order that the amending of the legislation would take place as soon as possible, and hoped tht the Government would be in a position to send a copy of the draft to the ILO as soon as it has been brought before Parliament.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

Morocco (ratification: 1958).The Government communicated the following information:

The legal minimum wage must not be less than the rate set by the competent authority. This is the right whatever the means for paying workers. Consequently, employers and workers cannot agree to apply a rate lower than the legal rate. The provisions concerning minimum wages apply to all employees in the private sector working in industry, commerce, agriculture, liberal occupations as well as domestic workers. The objective of fixing a legal minimum wage is to maintain the purchasing power of the wages paid at the SMIG. The elements which are taken into account in practice for the determination of level of minimum wages are the following:

- the evolution of the cost-of-living index;
- budgetary imperatives;
- the maintenance of economic equilibrium;
- the demands of the trade union organisations;
- the proposals of the employers' organisations.

The minimum wage-fixing machinery is regulated by the texts communicated in previous reports. In conformity with the practice and with national legislation, minimum wages may be raised by decree upon the proposal of the Ministry of Labour. This proposal is formulated taking into account the elements cited above and, more particularly, the grievance of trade unions. The consultation of occupational organisations with respect to the fixing of minimum wages is vigorously applied, in particular, at the level of tripartite committees created in the framework of dialogue between the Government and the social partners. The recent decision of revalorisation of the SMIG and of the SMAG, which was the object of a decree of 23 January 1991, was only taken after several meetings of consultaton with the different occupational organisations. The complainant organisations had also taken part, when they wished, in some of these meetings with the Prime Minister.

In conformity with the legislation and national practice, the procedure for raising the minimum wage is begun each time there is a substantial increase in the cost-of-living index.

The following table indicates the increases in the minimum wage and the cost-of-living index from 1 January 1989 to 1 January 1991.

Date	Rate of increase	Cost-of-living index
1.5.1989	10%	3.1%
1.5.1990	10%	6.7%
1.1.1991	15%	6.7%

It is fitting to reaffirm, in conclusion, that all workers who have received a wage lower than the legal minimum have the right to appeal to the courts to cover the amount which is owed and that the failure of employers to respect the legal provisions in the matter are sanctioned by fines or, in the case of recidivity, by imprisonment.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information provided by his Government and added that the general principle of his country's labour legislation provided that wages were set by common agreement between workers and employers as long as the wages were not lower than the minimum fixed by the Government. Consultations had been held at the request of the Government between workers' and employers' organisations concerning the fixing of the minimum wage for 1991. The trade unions had made proposals which largely went beyond the means of the enterprises. The employers, while not opposing a reasonable increase in the minimum wage, defended the position that an increase in wage would have a negative effect on employment, which was the highest priority. Finally, a compromise solution was found which took into account the need to maintain the purchasing power of workers and the means of the enterprises. An increase of the minimum wage by 15 per cent was ordered by a Decree published on 1 January 1991. Similar consultations had been held in April 1992 prior to the publication of a Decree raising the minimum wage by 10 per cent starting from 1 May 1992. These two increases were greater than the increases registered in the cost of living. Furthermore, sanctions were provided in the case of a violation of the Minimum Wage Act and its implementing legislation. A special team of labour inspectors had been created in order to monitor the application of this legislation. In this regard, it should be noted that the Government had ratified Conventions Nos. 81 and 129 concerning labour inspection in industry and agriculture, respectively. Finally, workers who considered that they had a grievance had the right to appeal to a competent tribunal. As concerns the information concerning violations made by certain enterprises with respect to the minimum wage, he stated that he had no personal knowledge of this study except through the newspapers. The figures concerning the wages of seasonal workers cited in this study were incorrect, however. Instead of reporting the wages by hour or day actually worked, minimum monthly wages were compared with the wages of workers who sometimes worked only a few days per month.

The Employers' members noted that the complaint received from the unions in this case concerned (1) the unilateral establishment of the minimum wage: and (2) the fact that in practice the minimum wage was not respected. This last point was confirmed by the World Bank study of 1978. They noted all the information provided by the Government both in writing and orally in reply to the unions' complaint. While noting that the Government had not supplied a report for examination by the Committee of Experts at its last session, they stated that the only thing to be done was to ask the Government to furnish a full written report to the Office for the Committee of Experts to assess the application of the Convention in law and practice.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the statements made by the Employers' members.

A Workers' member of France associated himself with the statement made by the Employers' and Workers' members and added that there were certain questions which had not been answered concerning the real consultation of occupational organisations on the fixing of minimum wages. He noted that the minimum wage in the agricultural sector was lower than that in the private sector by about half. Furthermore, there were still workers in the public sector who did not receive a minimum wage. Finally, he requested the Government to indicate how many appeals had actually been made by workers to the courts to recover their wages.

A Workers' member of Greece associated himself with what had been said by the Workers' members. He noted that from the written information provided by the Government it appeared that the increases in the cost of living were followed by sufficient increases in the minimum wage. If this information was correct, he wondered why the trade unions had complained. As concerns the right of all workers to appeal to the courts to recover their wages he requested the Government to provide statistics on how many such appeals had been made. This would permit an assessment of whether, in fact, workers had this right or whether they were practically blocked from appealing to the courts for fear of losing their jobs.

A Workers' member of Papua New Guinea endorsed the comments made by the Workers' members and added that in most developing countries workers did not have the sufficient financial or technical means to hire lawyers in order to go to court if they were aggrieved. He expressed his concern that if the Government could unilaterally fix the minimum wage that they could also unilaterally abstain, leaving the workers in a no win situation.

The Government representative assured the Committee that his Government would send a detailed report to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts. With respect to the comment made by the Workers' member of France concerning whether there had been real consultations, he recalled that he had cited a practical example of this. While admitting that there was a difference in the minimum wage for industry and for agriculture he added that workers in the agricultural sector had additional payments in kind. As concerns the public sector, it was not possible to compare the minimum wages when the working week in the public sector was 37 hours, while in commerce and industry it was 48 hours. The speaker corrected the figure presented in the written information and stated that there was a new increase of 10 per cent which had been promulgated on 1 May 1992. Finally, as concerns the possibility of workers to appeal to the courts, he recalled that this was a last resort and that prior to this the trade unions and staff representatives were there to defend the worker, the labour inspection would ensure application of the law and only if all this failed did the worker need to appeal to the courts.

The Workers' member of Greece clarified his previous point by indicating that he could not understand why the unions had complained if there had in fact been sufficient increase in the minimum wage to ensure purchasing power. The facts of this matter should be looked into by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of France noted that further information was needed concerning the minimum wage in the agricultural sector: how much more did the workers make through payment in kind and did they benefit from the national social security scheme?

The Government representative stated that he did not have the necessary statistics with him to reply to the amount of the wages agricultural workers were paid in kind. Agricultural workers were, however, covered by the social security scheme since 1983. Finally, in reply to the Workers' member of Greece he stated that even if the Government increased the minimum wage substantially, the workers would always find arguments to ask for more.

A Workers' member of Liberia noted that a minimum wage was never sufficient and should always be improved upon. Furthermore a unilateral fixing of wages was unacceptable.

The Committee noted the written and oral information supplied by the Government. Given the fact that the Government did not report within the prescribed time, the Committee felt that it was not in a position to discuss the substance without the Committee of Experts having made an assessment of the situation. It therefore hoped that the Government would report in detail on the points raised by the Committee of Experts in the near future in order that the Conference Committee could consider the substance of the case in one of its next sessions.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Brazil (ratification: 1957). A Government representative recognised the existence of problems in the application of the Convention and was the first to be interested in overcoming them. He also requested the Committee to indicate the various forms of cooperation not only with the ILO but also with other States which were able to provide it. The speaker welcomed the Committee of Experts' recognition in its report of the efforts made by the Government, federal inspection bodies and the federal police, with the support of workers' and employers' organisations, to eradicate forced labour, and that it also noted measures taken in this respect. However, the Committee is wrong in saying that the Government has not supplied information on the allegations presented by the Association of Labour Inspectors (AGITRA) and the International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers (IFPAAW); the information in question was supplied to the ILO in October 1991 and April 1992. While in general terms the description by the Committee of Experts of the phenomena of forced labour in Brazil is correct, the two organisations which denounced the situation have also mentioned the difficulty in defining the exact dimensions of the problem. One should therefore rely on factual information and should not let oneself be carried away by emotions in order to avoid sterile and hypothetical discussions. The central problem lies in the existence of conditions of work which are repugnant to national conscience. The allegations concerning forced labour are coming from different trade unions, non-governmental or political organisations, and are often repeated by the national and international media; in fact, these allegations rarely result in formal accusations before the police and labour authorities. The majority of cases entailing allegations of forced labour concern regions which are difficult to reach. In 1991 and 1992, 31 complaints on forced labour were presented to the labour inspection and subjected to investigation: in nine of these cases, neither allegations of forced labour nor allegations about other infringements of the labour legislation were substantiated; in one case, the inspectors noted that the allegations were motivated by personal political rivalry between a trade unionist and the owner of the exploitation; in another case presented by a member of the Parliament the investigation showed that the workers who were alleged to be victims of forced labour, had been recruited through the intermediary of the Trade Union of Agricultural Workers of Bahia, and that the rights of these workers wre respected and all of them were able to return home at the end of the contract. In 15 other cases, the inspectors did not find any evidence of forced labour but concluded that there was a breach of labour law, most often due to the failure to register workers and the practice of deductions on wages for food and lodging which made the worker permanently "indebted"; in all the cases which were investigated, the situation has been remedied. As concerns the remaining seven cases, the allegations unfortunately were confirmed: in the State of Para 400 workers whom the landowners prevented from leaving were liberated; in two other cases in the State of Rio Grande do Sul the responsible persons were prosecuted. In the majority of cases the allegations were not confirmed and there was only proof of other violations of the labour legislation. In order to eliminate all the violations of the Convention, the Minister of Labour has drawn up a programme designed to eliminate forced labour and to improve the action of different governmental services and the labour inspection; this programme was submitted to the authorities and the departments concerned. The Labour Ministry has also decided to implement immediately a plan of urgent action concerning the regions with the largest number of allegations and complaints of forced labour. The Government has also requested the cooperation of the ILO in the field of labour inspection to eliminate all possible forms of forced labour. These few examples show that the Government is making all efforts to suppress forced labour. However, because of the magnitude of the social problems afflicting the developing countries, the interventions of the police and the labour inspection are not sufficient by themselves to remedy this situation of structural imbalance, and greater international cooperation is needed than that existing today. The complaints are useful, but constructive suggestions are even more so, as the workers' cause should not be used by the ill-intentioned parties to serve their own interests. The government, for its part, wishes the eradication of all forms of violation of human rights and particularly of rights of the Brazilian workers.

The Workers' members expressed their profound dissatisfaction with the reply given by the Government representative which raised doubts as to whether the Government is really truly aware of the significance of what is taking place in the country. The issues in question concerned slave labour.While the law in Brazil in these matters appears to be adequate according to the Committee of Experts, the real question is its implementation. The statements made by the Government representative at the outset seemed to indicate that these problems do exist and that efforts were made to solve them, but later he went on to say that in fact the cases which had been investigated emerged as being presented for political reasons, were isolated, and that there was no problem at all; in fact, out of all these cases, they actually found only seven, which were subjected to court action. The information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts however presents an entirely different picture. The allegations made come not from one particular body or one group of trade unionists who have a political aim, they come from a wide variety of organisations, including not only trade unions, but also intergovernmental bodies, investigative journalists and churches, and the cries of all these various bodies have been heard throughout the world. Statistics show that between 1980 and 1991 the Association of Labour Inspectors (AGITRA), which should know something about the problem and presumably have no axe to grind, reported 3.144 cases of persons subjected to forced labour on 32 estates in the south of Para; there are lists of 56 estates on which complaints of forced labour have been made; nationwide, 8,886 cases have been counted; in 1991, 53 persons were murdered or disappeared; and the Government still considers that there is no problem. As to the comment concerning the need to recognise the difficulties of governments who have to rule vast areas of countryside, the AGITRA points out that these cases are not confined to remote areas but a number of them have been complained of at places near to the most developed parts of the country including areas within 100 kms of main towns. Those are areas which the police force could reach within a matter of hours at the most. The Committee of Experts' report mentions horrifying facts of child labour, observed also by a group of parliamentarians, where children of barely 10 years of age, as well as men and women, are working 12 hours a day in total dependence upon the employer, which is, of course, a nice way of saying "slave labour". The Committee of Experts points out that strong articles exist in the federal Constitution – real estate may be taken away from the owners, penalties of imprisonment – but according to the Government representative, only seven persons were tried in the State of Para, three in Mato Grosso and eight in Espiritu Santo. He wished to know the number of prosecutions taking place as they give some idea of the measures taken by the Government. It seemed, however, that the Government is not using all its will, despite the social and economic problems it has in the country, as there are in fact so few prosecutions. The Workers' members hoped that the Government representative would admit the problem and indicate the initiatives taken because this was a question of the political will to do something about what is a disgrace to his country. The implementation of a Convention is a question of will and the Workers' objective in this Committee is to try to impress by dialogue, sometimes expressing themselves quite strongly, upon governments the need to implement Conventions, particularly those on human rights. The Workers therefore hoped that the Government representative will take away from this Committee the deep and abiding concern that very little seems to have been done on this Convention and that in the light of the Committee of Experts' report no progress whatsoever can be recorded on this, one of the most important, Convention.

The Employers' members stressed that comments have been made by the Experts since 1985 and regretted that this was the first time that this case was actually discussed. This case was sufficiently serious for the Committee to review next year. They associated themselves with the opinion of the Workers' members that after openly acknowledging the problem, the Government representative tried to minimise it by discussing only 31 cases. The information provided by the Experts showed that the dimensions of this problem are huge and can hardly be limited to 31 cases. There are essentially two problems. One concerns the problem of debt bondage where individuals are induced to travel thousands of miles away from home, finding themselves afterwards in a cycle where they cannot work themselves out of the debt that they have incurred for their transportation, food and lodging. It is worth noting that Brazil ratified in 1957 the Protection of Wages Convention (No. 45). Article 6 of that Convention prohibits empoyers from limiting in any manner the freedom of the worker to dispose of his wages; Article 8 relates to conditions and limits of the deduction from wages to be prescribed by national laws and regulations; and Article 9 relates to prohibitions of deductions from wages with a view to obtaining or retaining employment. This is exactly the situation that is observed, and it is the one of merging of two sets of legal requirements, one under a fundamental human rights Convention, and another under one that deals with traditional terms and conditions of employment. The second problem relates in a large part to Convention No. 5 and concerns child labour; children work without wages in the hope of increasing the output of their parents and to help the family repay the debt that they have incurred through their employment. As the Workers' members have noted, it appears that the Government has all the necessary laws in place, but that there is a problem of implementation in practice. The Government has ratified Convention No. 81 and part of the solution to this problem is having an adequate inspection service. While recognising the practical difficulty in policing in a large country, it should be noted that the Experts pointed to situations in accessible municipal areas which have not been addressed. This is a regrettable situation of very large dimensions. The Employers' members noted steps that the Government has taken in terms of training, improving inspections in the regions, and cooperation with the ILO, and proceeded to encourage the Government to extend and expand these efforts to cure the problem in the near future.

A Workers' member of Senegal declared in connection with the comments made by the Government representative on the involvement of trade unions of agricultural workers in the recruitment of certain workers, that it is indeed the Brazilian Government which is called here to give explanations. The problem is not one of trade unions which violated the Brazilian laws but that of the workers being exploited and treated as slaves, and of the fact that those responsible for this situation were not at all menaced. It it appeared that trade unions were violating Brazilian laws, the Government should take measures to ensure that they are respected.

The Government representative, replying to the comments of the Workers' members, declared that the discussion did not concern slavery or debt bondage, but infringements of the labour legislation. The Government is fully conscious of the gravity of the problem and has decided to deal with it with all seriousness; all the cases which are brought to the attention of the authorities result in immediate and concrete actions. In 1991 the federal police had conducted about 50 investigations which did not lead to court proceedings, but in another 49 investigations the cases were submitted to the tribunals; however it was not the labour legislation which was concerned but the criminal law. The Employers' members rightfully stated that Brazil possesses a potentially effective judical arsenal to deal with the problem, and the Government is using it willfully and with great vigour. Concerning the protection of wages, the cases mentioned represent infringements of the labour laws and necessary measures have been taken by the Government. Referring to the comments of the Workers' member of Senegal, the Government representative indicated that firstly, he never had the intention of accusing a trade union, and secondly, that the workers form part of the labour committees. Brazil has a highly developed and active network of trade union organisations which keep a very close watch on the observance of the rights of their members. It also has a very committed labour inspection system as well as an efficient and well-developed tripartite system in the labour field. Brazil does not tolerate forced labour and, once complained of every violation of labour rights is subject to prosecutions and immediate corrective measures.

The Workers' members expressed their total dissatisfaction with the reply given by the Government representative. Recalling that they were speaking about slave labour under the Convention dealing with forced labour, they consider that forced labour is in fact slave labour in situations when, as described in the Committee of Experts' report, children barely 10 years old were obliged to work 12 hours a day in a relationship of total dependence upon an employer, and thousands of workers could not terminate their employment without the risk of being ill-treated, tortured or even killed.

Concerning the regret expressed by the Government representative that the report did not mention the information communicated to the Committee of Experts by the Government, the Chairman informed the Committee that said information reached the ILO after the Committee of Experts had met and drawn up its report.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government representative. It recognised the difficulties the Government was meeting with a view to implementing the existing legislation in certain remote parts of this very large country. It took note of the endeavours the Government made in this respect. But, taking into consideration the seriousness of the matter under discussion, it felt that the endeavours of the Government have to be reinforced in order to end the existence of the appalling labour conditions. It hoped to be able to conclude that the Government made great progress in this respect at its next session.

Cuba (ratification: 1953). A Government representative indicated that Chapter 3 of the Labour Code contained provisions in force on working hours and rests. The regulation on working days and overtime was very precise. The working hours were eight per day and 44 per week. Under the Labour Code, the workers were not obliged to work overtime and in the case in which overtime was permitted, daily or weekly limits were prescribed. On the legal point of view, voluntary work was recognised as the expression of the individual or collective social consciousness, but no worker was obliged either on legal grounds or on the viewpoint of government policy to perform the voluntary work. The voluntary work exercised by workers in Cuby was strictly voluntary, and nobody could be sanctioned, prosecuted or deprived of any rights for not performing voluntary work. The labour legislation contained a guarantee of necessary procedures to permit the worker to submit a complaint if he considered his right was hindered. The process of accumulating merits and demerits of the workers realised under the direction of trade unions by virtue of resolution No. 590 of 1980 was a way of recognition and moral stimulation of workers who accomplished the voluntary work, and was not an indirect form of compulsion to work in terms of the Convention. This procedure had been for a few months the object of consultations with the workers' and employers' organisations concerned, and a draft resolution which would repeal resolution No. 590 of 1980 was about to be adopted; this draft resolution also provided for the elimination of work books and records of merit and demerit which had been accumulated under the resolution. Workers' rights depended on regulation in the Labour Code and supplementary legislation ; no provision conditioned the exercise of rights upon the accomplishment of voluntary work.

The Workers' members stated that they would have appreciated more information from the Government representative whether, as noted in the report of the Committee of Experts, resolution No. 590 of 1980 was still in the process of being examined with a view to making the necessary amendments in the light of the particular circumstances of the country. Nobody argues against voluntary work ; many people in many countries devote an enormous amount of time and effort, for example, to charitable work without pay. The voluntary work in Cuba appears to be different from such voluntary work ; it is enshrined in the Labour Code ; there are work books of merit, although it has been argued nobody takes any account of them. If the records exist, either expressly or implicitly, for the purpose of awarding a promotion, or other privileges, trips, access to goods and materials which other people cannot obtain, it would bring the situation into contravention of Convention No. 29. The Workers' members expressed a fear that the emphasis upon voluntary labour, and the amount of voluntary labour undertaken, seemed to imply that there was a measure of compulsion somewhere or other. If the Government could eliminate from its laws references to voluntary work that would be a start. Then the next stage would be to ensure that there was not tacit or implied pressure on workers to perform this function. The Workers' members expressed their concern about the references to voluntary work, and the establishment of quotas for voluntary work, which seemed to imply a situation slightly different from what was conveyed by the Government, both in its reply noted by the Committee of Experts and in the statement by the Government representative today.

The Employers' members fully associated themselves with the Workers' members. The issue here is the question of voluntary labour and it seems that the Government representative, in her own way, essentially acknowledged that there is a problem in Cuba with respect to this issue because the Government is going to make some amendments to Resolution No. 590 as regards the registers of workers who participate or fail to participate in "voluntary" labour. If these registers are maintained, there is an implicit, if not explicit compulsion labour in Cuba, particularly because the annual assemblies consider the reports of trade unions on this subject. The Convention defines forced or compulsory labour as "all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily". When registers are kept on participation in voluntary labour programmes, the persons concerned seem to be under the menace of some kind of penalty to the extent that they may be deprived of some right or of some privilege if they failed to participate in the programme. Article 9 (c) of the Convention citing the conditions under which forced or compulsory labour may be exacted, provides that the authorities have to satisfy themselves in the first place "that it has been impossible to obtain voluntary labour for carrying out the work or rendering the service by the offer of rates of wages and conditions of labour not less favourable than those prevailing in the area concerned for similar work or service". That, in the context of the Convention, is what voluntary labour is meant to mean. The Employers were surprised that the Experts did not see this as a case under Convention No.105 as well as, particularly when the CTC acknowledges that voluntary work benefits economic and social development. But that is not before this Committee now. It is therefore clear that there is a fundamental problem in Cuba with respect to voluntary labour which cannot be viewed as anything less than forced labour; at the very least the existing registers should be abolished in law and in practice. The Government should be invited to supply a complete report on the situation in this respect indicating in detail how this system of registers functions, explaining how merits and demerits are determined, as well as giving all other pertinent information in order that the Committee could once again examine the case next year in full knowledge of the facts.

Another Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, stated that sufficient information had been presented to the Conference Committee to show that there is no legislation which establishes voluntary labour. As it seemed that some form of suspicion exists in this respect, judging from the statements made by the Workers' members in particular, the speaker had to reaffirm without any ambiguity that in Cuba there is no form of voluntary labour which is regulated by legislation, nor is it exercised under the pressure of anybody : the voluntary work is done on a voluntary basis. In regard of Resolution No. 590 the Government had two reasons for amending it: first, because although it had been modified in 1980, it was adopted 15 years ago, and secondly,because well-intentioned persons could make a link with voluntary labour. His Government had their own methods of providing incentives for efficient and productive labourers and what had been insinuated by the Workers' spokesman could not be accepted. If one continues to represent voluntary labour as a form of forced labour, one runs the risk that one day his Government will be accused, here, of imposing forced labour by the fact that hundreds and perhaps thousands of youth coming from other countries, including the United States, are organised into brigades to perform voluntary labour in Cuba, joining in work with Cuban youth and workers in a gesture of solidarity which the Government appreciated. It is moreover necessary to clearly reaffirm that no-one is forced to work voluntarily in Cuba. Cubans, and notably workers, are freedom-loving and they would not accept any form of constraint.

After the discussion on the wording of the conclusions of the Committee and, in particular, on the question of whether they reflected the content of the discussion on the Convention – in which participated two Government representatives of Cuba, Employers' members, Workers' members and the Workers' member of Chile – the Committee adopted its conclusions.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government, explaining what it called allegations, that no forced labour exists in Cuba. The Committee, however, felt the response of the Government to the obsevations of the Committee of Experts not satisfactory. It therefore asked the Government to send the full report at its earliest convenience to the ILO and decided to review the situation at its next session.

The Government representative requested that the reservation of her Government on this conclusion be reflected.

India (ratification: 1954). The Government communicated the following information:

Identification of bonded labourers

The identification of bonded labourers is mainly undertaken by the Revenue Department and the Block Development Officer of the state governments. The labour ministry has issued circular instructions highlighting the need for undertaking fresh efforts for identification. It suggests the following steps:

(a) household surveys should be conducted by the Revenue Department with the help of field agencies like the Directorate of Economics and Statistics, Zonal Directorate of Backward Classes' Welfare and similar agencies on the lines of the survey drawn up by the National Sample Survey Organisation in their 32nd round;

(b) identification should be done during censuses conducted for the allotment of house sites under the IRDP;

(c) intensive studies should be undertaken in stone quarries and brick kilns.

The release of a bonded labourer is a judicial process. The procedure for releasing a bonded labourer has been laid down in section 21 of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976. The procedure envisages a summary inquiry as provided under the Criminal Procedure Code. After the inquiry is completed, the keeper of the bonded labourer can be punished and the bonded labourer has to be freed, liquidating all his debts and liabilities vis-à-vis the employer. If the offence of keeping a bonded labourer is proved, punishment is mandatory according to section 16 of the Act.

Vigilance committees

The vigilance committees are set up by the state governments in almost all the districts and subdivisions where the problem of bonded labour is endemic. These committees hold periodic meetings to review the implementation of the Act and to assist the authorities for identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers and also to guide the implementing authorities.

Integration of the bonded labour scheme with other anti-poverty schemes

The need to integrate the efforts being made under the scheme of rehabilitation of bonded labourers with other ongoing beneficiary-oriented anti-poverty programmes has been stressed by the state governments from time to time. The state governments in turn have issued directions to their implementing agencies to take suitable measures to integrate the scheme of rehabilitation with other ongoing beneficiary-oriented anti-poverty programmes being implemented.

National Commission on Bonded Labour

The entire matter of setting up the National Commission on Bonded Labour was examined in detail by the Ministry of Labour in the light of the recommendation of the National Commission on Rural Labour. It has been decided that the setting up of another commission is not necessary at this stage. It was felt that what is required is better implementation of the provisions of the Act by the state governments which should be closely monitored each month. In view of this, the chief secretaries of all concerned state governments have been addressed by the Union Labour Secretary in the matter of taking vigorous steps for the identification and rehabilitation of bonded labourers on 7 February 1992. A system of quarterly monitoring has been introduced.

The labour minister's directive to the state governments to avoid corruption and misappropriation of funds in the process of the identification and freeing of bonded labour

Labour as a subject forms part of the Concurrent List in the Constitution of India which implies that the Union Government and the state governments have joint responsibility in the formulation of labour policy and legislation. In view of this constitutional provision, a large number of labour laws are enacted by the central Government but are enforced by the state governments. This arrangement exists for the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976. For better implementation of this and other similar labour laws, the Government advises the state governments from time to time.

Child labour

The Government has initiated orientation-cum-training courses to motivate and sensitise enforcement staff to interact with them about the problems of child labour, the need to strictly enforce the labour laws relating to child labour and also to have a special approach to the problem as a whole. It is proposed to expand this programme not only to include the enforcement machinery but also the NGOs, the community at large, the workers' and the employers' groups. In fact, two state-level tripartite workshops have been held in the states of Tamil Nadu and Uttar Pradesh involving the government, the employers' group and the workers' group to draw up a comprehensive action plan not only to integrate the welfare inputs but also to have a coordinated effort by all social partners involved in the task of the elimination of child labour. The Government has also initiated active consultation with the employers' and workers' groups separately to discuss the problems being faced in the implementation of the law and to find out ways and means of improving the situation especially with reference to the role that the employers' and workers' groups play in this regard.

Regarding the Committee's comment in respect of the writ petition (Cvil) Case No. 12125 of 1984, it is still sub judice. It may be mentioned that the fact-finding committee was appointed by the order of the Supreme Court and has since submitted their report to them. As soon as the Court's decision is obtained, further information will be provided to the Committee.

The Government has also supplied the statistics on the bonded labourers identified and rehabilitated as at 31 March 1991 and the target fixed for 1991-92; on the number of prosecutions launched under the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976, as at

March 1988, and extracts taken from the Supreme Court's judgement dated 16 December 1983 in Bandhua Mkuti Morcho v. Union of India and others.

In addition, a Government representative, referring to the written information provided by the Government, indicated that the central Government had not sent a report on the Convention because of difficulties in the collection of information from various state Governments. The central Government cannot fulfil also the request of the Committee of Experts to provide full information on the findings and recommendations of a committee formed pursuant to the Supreme Court's judgement of 1983, as the central Government had not received it from the state Government of Haryana, but the following information may be useful for the Committee to assess the following action which has been taken. The Supreme Court's judgement of 1983 gave a very broad and liberal interpretation of the definition of the term "bonded labour" system; this has been brought to the notice of the state Governments and to the district authorities; and the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act of 1976 was amended accordingly in 1985. The statistics which have been made available by the state Government of Haryana show that there have been 544 identified cases of bonded labour as of March 1991; only 21 cases out of them have been rehabilitated but the state Government is taking the necessary follow-up measures in the rest of the cases. According to the latest statistics as of 31 March 1991, the total number of identified bonded labourers is 255, 608, out of which 222,985 have been rehabilitated. In order to accelerate the process of identification, the central Government has issued instructions to the various state Governments highlighting the need for undertaking from time to time fresh efforts for identification of these cases, like the household surveys are conducted by the revenue departments, and the development departments at the grass-root level, and various statistics-collecting machinery, as well as surveys done by the National Sample Survey Organisation. These bodies have also been advised to take up intensive studies in stone quarries and brick kilns. Regarding the vigilance committees, the speaker confirmed that they are set up by the state Governments almost at every district and subdivisional level where the problem of bonded labour is endemic. These committees have been holding periodic meetings to review the implementation of the above-mentioned Act and assisting the authorities in identifying, in releasing and in rehabilitating bonded labour. However, it is not always possible for the central Government to go into the details of the workings of the vigilance committees, this work being done by the state Governments. On the question of involvement of voluntary agencies, she indicated that they are paid managerial subsidies to conduct their work on the basis of 50 per cent grants at 5,000 rupees per annum as a matching grant. In addition, they are also paid a certain amount for each release order in excess of a limit which is given on a year-to-year basis. So far there have been four voluntary agencies which have been subsidised by different state Governments, but there are other voluntary agencies which may not be taking the help of the Government but still contributing to this process in their own way. According to the information collected from the state Governements, no new surveys have been undertaken by them but they were instructed to consider the possibility of vesting the necessary powers with the grass-root district administration to facilitate this task.

On the question of the integration of the various anti-poverty development programmes which the Government started a number of years ago, it had been advising all state Governments to try to build up such integration and linkages so that there is the least chance of the bonded labourers, once released, to revert back to that status. As regards the proposal for the institution of a national commission on bonded labour, the Government has examined it and decided that the setting up of another commission is not necessary at this stage; what is required is a better implementation of the provisions of the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act by the state Governments is what is required and a system of quarterly monitoring has been introduced to that end.

On the issue of child labour, she stated that her country has constitutional and legislative provisions prohibiting child labour in certain hazardous occupations/processes and regulating their conditions work in other employments. A national policy on child labour was also formulated in 1987 covering the welfare aspect of child labour. It is further proposed to expand this programme to include not only enforcement machinery but also the NGOs, the community at large, and the workers' and employers' organisations, with which consultations were initiated to discuss their contribution towards elimination of child labour. The speaker also referred to an extensive collaboration with UNICEF in this area and to the obligations which the international community, and not only the central Government, has in moving towards elimination of child labour. Under the inernational programme for the eliminaiton of child labour initiated by the ILO, India would be taking up the programmes involving the NGOs in a number of areas and categories of employment, the training of the inspectorate, and intends to initiate a massive awareness campaign within the country. The Committee of Experts has also drawn attention to the report of the fact-finding committee appointed by Order of the Supreme Court in 1991 on a particular case before it. As soon as the Court's decision is obtained, the Government will provide further information to the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the considerable amount of information provided but expressed their disappointment to the extent that much of this information could haave been supplied to the Committee of Experts earlier, so that the present Committee could base its conclusions on the evaluation of the situation by the Experts. They considered, however, that on the point raised by the Committee of Experts concerning the Supreme Court's judgement of 1983 and the committee to investigate the issue of identifying bonded labourers in the State of Haryana, the Government should provide full details as required by the Experts and not excuse itself by invoking the fact that the matter is sub judice and the information is therefore not available. On the question concerning the identification, freeing and rehabilitation of bonded labourers, the Experts refer to the information submitted by Anti-Slavery International that debt bondage affected almost 5 million adults and 10 million children in India. The figures provided by the Government in this respect seem to be peculiarly constant: 242,000 bonded labourers in 1989, 245,000 in 1990, and now, as at 31 March 1991, the figure is given at 255,608. If such precise figures can be obtained there appears to be a highly developed system of collecting statistics and still the Central Government points to the difficulties it has in getting information from the various states. It is important to provide statistics in order that this Committee may assess the efforts being made by the Government to deal with the obligations under this Convention. It is equally important, as the Committee of Experts point out, to involve trade unions, social partners, and many other organisations in the work that needs to be undertaken in this case. This concerns the problem of the identification of bonded labour and the role of the vigilance committees in this respect; noting the importance of their role, the Experts asked the Government to ensure that the vigilance committees are constituted, have regular meetings and maintain registers. The Workers expressed their disappointment with the written information provided by the Government in this respect to the extent that it seems that the central Government is not able to monitor the work of the vigilance committees and is almost throwing up its hands in despair. Also there was not much information about the involvement of voluntary agencies and on the schemes for rehabilitation. The Workers' members requested the Government to provide the Committee of EWxperts with the information it has requested on how many agencies were contected and their response, concerning the categories of activities in which released bonded labourers are rehabilitated and the mechanisms which exist for the follow up of rehabilitation measures, as well as on any action plans adopted to promote the integration of bonded labour schemes and other anti-poverty schemes. Concerning the decision not to institute a national commission on bonded labour, the Workers' members could understand this if this commission would be nothing but another bureaucratic measure, but thought that such a commission might conceivably be used to coordinate all the various activities referred to by the Government. They suggested that all the arguments and recommendations in this respect should be presented to the Committee of Experts so that it can see whether the abolition of this initiative is a good thing. One particularly important area is the enforcement of the law and the Government should once again, as requested by the Experts, provide detailed information on the actions brought before the Supreme Court of India and the High Courts of the different states concerning bonded labour. The Government perhaps could be asked to speed up the process of the consideration of some of these cases by the judiciary. In view of the horrifying facts on the use of child labour referred to in the report and recognising that Western countries had their share of responsibility in the economic exploitation of Indian children, the Workers' members believed that pressure should be kept up on the Indian Government in order to ensure that there continues to be the maximum effort made to bring to an end bonded labour and child labour in the subcontinent. The Conference Committee should encourage, indeed by sometimes criticising the Government, the active assistance of all the machinery of the ILO to help it in its work. It must continue to examine all the aspects of this problem and so must the Committee of Experts. In conclusion, they once again invited the Government to supply future reports to the ILO in order to facilitate the work of the supervisory bodies.

The Employers' members observed that reading the seven pages of the Committee of Experts' report this year and the written reply of the Government, and in listening to the declaration of the Government representative today, one had the impression that the problem is being resolved. This is not the caseo. This impression is year's Experts' report described the situation in much more vivid terms and this year the Experts basically limited themselves to making 11 information requests to the Government which do not reflect the reality of the problem. There are in fact two problems – bonded labour and child labour – two subjects which give rise to a very deep concern. Obviously, there are laws which deal with these two questions, but the problem is the one of application. The penal sanctions are in the text but it seems that the exploiters of bonded labour and child labour really have nothing to fear because of the slowness of the judiciary process. One of the essential difficulties comes from the fact that the real dimensions of the problem are not known: partly it concerns the problem of the identification of bonded labourers but also it may go to what in fact is the definition of bonded labour. Numerous statistics were supplied but his Committee does not know whether the figure of approximately 250,000 persons is exact, whether it is higher or lower. The speaker said that he was inclined to consider it to be higher. This year's report does not give the impression that there are still difficulties with the vigilance committees. The Government said that they all have been set up and that it is assumed that they are operating well; however, last year's report indicated that a large number of these committees had not been set up and some of them do not seem to work very well. The Government should increase its efforts in respect of these committees which are one of the key instruments it uses to solve the problem. The Government representative stated that it has no way of assessing the effectiveness of these committees, but it is not enough for a federal State to say that a given subject comes under the responsibility of the constituent states; it has to incite them to supply the requested information in order that the Experts and this Committee can examine whether the mechanism used to remedy the situation are in fact efficient. One key part of the remedy to the problem of bonded labour is the integration of the rehabilitation schemes with other anti-poverty schemes; the Government should not just issue instructions in this respect but take other measures to push the process along. Last year's report indicated that this rehabilitation process has been delayed and that some freed labourers have fallen back into bondage because subsistence allowances which they received have not been high enough.

As they did last year, the Employers' members invited the federal Government to reconsider its strategy consisting in withholding financing from States if they did not increase their efforts, because this resulted in denying help to the very persons that needed it most.

The laws exist also in respect of child labour but they do not seem to be rigorously applied in practice. The gravity and the dimensions of the problem were well described in the report of the Committee of Experts. The measures mentioned by the Government representative are a step in the right direction, but once again the exploiters of child labour as well as bonded labour do not seem to have much to fear from the sanctions because of the slowness of the judicial process. The Committee must pursue its efforts to combat this problem step by step hoping that it may be resolved soon.

The Government representative stressed that the Government of India is equally, if not more deeply, concerned with both the issues of child labour and bonded labour. She said that the judiciary process was slow at times and that in respect of the vigilence committees it is very difficult for the central Government to collect the information. The Government decided to strengthen its implementation procedures through a quarterly monitoring system. She clarified that the decision of not instituting a national commission on bonded labour has been a conscious decision of the Government – taking all points under consideration should take care of the apprehensions expressed by the Workers. Regarding child labour it set up a task force to go into the various aspects of its problem and the central Government, in cooperation with the states, is actively engaged to fill in the loopholes in the legislation and to ensure that the minimum penalties imposed by the law are also given effect to by the honourable courts. An informal dialogue with the judiciary is also envisaged to find out ways and means of strengthening the implementation of the Act. In conclusion, the Government representative reiterated her Government's commitment to comply with the Committee of Experts' comments and the conclusions of the Conference Committee.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government. It regretted that the detailed oral information provided had not been contained in a written report sent to the Committee of Experts. Regrettably, under these circumstances, the Committee could not fully asess the situation in particular as concerns the abolition of bonded labour. It firmly hoped that the Government would supply full particulars on the different points raised by the Committee of Experts at its earliest convenience so that the Conference Committee could make a thorough assessment at one of its next sessions.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (ratification : 1961). The Government supplied the following information :

The Government considers that there is no contradiction between article 1 of Law No. 20 of 1962, article 6, of the Decree of 5 October 1955 and this Convention. The confinement provided for in section 1 of Law No. 20 of 1962 and the imprisonment provided for in section 6 of the Decree of 5 October 1955 do not combine with the obligation to work. In addition, even if labour was required during such confinement and imprisonment, it would be within the exception provided for in section 2, paragraph 2 (c), of the Convention.

The Committee of Experts' statement that "... in both cases the persons concerned, who are merely suspected or accused, and detained by decision of judge, are obliged to work" is an incorrect interpretation of the provisions of the above-mentioned laws.

Section 71 of Law No. 40 of 1974 on service in the armed forces and section 108 of Law No. 55 of 1976 on resignations within the Civil Service, are contrary to the Convention. These provisions have been entrusted to the competent departments with a view to amending them.

In addition, a Government representative indicated that the blockade imposed on his country had made communication difficult with the ILO. The setting up of a new technical committee with responsibility for examining the observations of the Committee of Experts had been proposed by the Department of Vocational Training. Replies had been given to the comments of the Committee of Experts. With respect to the Convention, his Government believed that the comments on article 1 of Law No. 20 of 1962 were without foundation. This could be seen clearly in Article 2, paragraph 2 (c), of the Convention, where there is an express exclusion of this type of work from the definition of forced or obligatory labour. The law of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was in every respect in keeping with the provisions of the Convention. The interpretation of the Committee of Experts, viz., that persons suspected or accused of certain offences were subjected to forced labour, was also incorrect. The limitations imposed on the freedom of public servants and members of the armed forces to leave their employment was, it should be noted, the object of a re-examination at the present time.

The Workers' members welcomed the explanations given by the Government representative, which were incidentally of interest in view of paragraph 150 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts. It was difficult to continue a dialogue with governments if they failed to submit their reports to the Committee of Experts within the time limits laid down. The Government apparently saw no contradiction between article 1 of Law No. 20 of 1962 and the Convention. The Committee of Experts was of a different opinion and undoubtedly had a reason for its opinion. When a government held an opinion different from that of the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members tended rather to side with the Committee of Experts, made up as it was of eminent legal experts. Only a detailed report by the Government would permit a definite opinion to be given. With respect to restrictions on the freedom of workers to leave their employment there was disquieting news concerning the position of Sri Lankan women employed in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. The Government was requested to submit detailed information on this matter. The Workers' members emphasised the necessity to submit reports on the application of ratified Conventions in order to permit a genuine dialogue within the Conference Committee.

The Employers' agreed with the Workers' members. The first point concerned forced labour, which could be imposed on the basis of suspicion or accusation of certain offences; this was clearly in violation of the Convention. On this point they requested the Government representative to report to his Government that the Conference Committee shared the opinion of the Committee of Experts. On the second point concerning the possibility of leaving employment, if such a possibility were not envisaged this would be a violation of the Convention. It followed from the Government's written reply that it shared this opinion, inasmuch as an alteration of existing provisions had been envisaged. The Government could be invited to bring about this modification as soon as possible.

The Government representative informed the Workers' members that the new technical committee (the only one qualified to deal with these matters) would be informed of the question of bringing the Libyan law into line with the Convention. Even though the observations of the Committee of Experts might be relevant, there was no contradiction between the aforesaid provisions and the Convention. With respect to civil servants' freedom to resign, the matter had been referred to the competent authorities. With regard to the disquiet expressed by the Workers' members concerning the Sri Lankan women employed in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, he had no information on the subject.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information submitted by the Government. It understood that the Government hoped that it was not in contradiction with the Convention. In view of the fact that the Government did not send a full report on the ratified Conventions in due time, the Committee felt it was not in a position to agree with the Government's viewpoint. As the subject-matter was of a very serious nature, the Committee urged the Government to reconsider its position so as to amend the legislation in the sense suggested by the Committee of Experts. The Committee hoped that the Government would submit to the ILO a report containing full particulars at its earliest convenience.

Morocco (ratification: 1957). The Government communicated the following information:

The Ministry of Employment notes the observations of the Committee of Experts and those of the CDT and the UGTM. It reiterates that they were taken into consideration in the Bills drafted by the Government and, in particular, the draft Labour Code. The observations made by the Committee in 1991 have been transmitted to the competent authorities so as to speed up the adoption procedure of the aforementioned draft Acts.

As regards the absence in national legislation of provisions imposing penal sanctions for illegal forced labour, the draft Labour Code provides that violations of Article 28 (which prohibits forced or compulsory labour) are punished by terms of imprisonment from two months to two years and a fine of 400 to 2,000 dirhams, or one of these penalties only. This draft, which has already been approved by the Council of Ministers, not only satisfies the requests made by the Committee of Experts, but would also allow ratification of other international instruments by Morocco.

Concerning the repeal of the Dahir dated 26 June 1930, allowing the employment of prisoners by private enterprises, the Ministry of Justice once again asked about this matter, reiterating that this Dahir is not applied any more since Morocco became independent. The draft general regulation on penitentiaries, which should repeal the provisions of this Dahir which are incompatible with Article 2 of the Convention, is currently being examined by the General Secretariat of the Government.

With respect to the legal texts and regulations allowing the calling up of persons and the requisitioning of goods in order to satisfy national needs, it should be noted that implementation of the right of requisition is limited in practice to exceptional situations, where the population's life and normal living conditions are at risk. The relevant departments have denied categorically the allegations made in this respect by the CDT and the UGTM. For instance, Royal Air Maroc states that the majority of staff reported voluntarily for work during the strike of 14 December 1991. The requisitioning of staff was unnecessary in the absence of exceptional circumstances which could justify it, in particular since the normal functioning of essential services is ensured by non–striking workers.

The information requests concerning the assignment of certain persons to civic service, and the applicable criteria to accept or reject the resignation request of a public servant, have been transmitted to the relevant departments.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information provided by his Government and added that the draft labour code which prohibited forced labour had been reviewed by a parliamentary committee on 13 May 1992. With regard to the persons assigned to civic service, he specified that this service was part of a series of measures aimed at the reinsertion of young persons into active life. It was very difficult for persons with diplomas who had no practical experience to find jobs. For budgetary reasons, the number of persons actually admitted to the civic service was much lower than the requests received. The Government was presently studying a draft text providing encouragement to private enterprise, such as the exemption from social taxes, if they would accept to take young university students as interns in order to help them complement their academic training with practical experience. The calling up of persons in order to satisfy national needs only occurred in exceptional situations. The law providing for this would be repealed and replaced by a new law, but since the Labour Code prohibited forced labour, perhaps this would not be necessary.

The Workers' members noted that the written and oral information provided by the Government had not been available to the Committee of Experts for examination. They recalled that, without the necessary information, the Committee of Experts could not assess the situation nor could this Committee be in a position to comment upon the substance of the case.

The Employers' members noted that the Government had been mentioning a draft Labour Code since 1969. The noted the Government's statement that the legal text concerning military recruits and the calling up of people in order to satisfy national needs would be repealed and requested the Government to indicate when this would be done. They hoped that draft legislation could be submitted to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts in the near future. They noted the Government's indication that the employment of prisoners by the private sector no longer occurred in practice and that the relevant Dahir (Act) would be repealed by a general regulation on penitentiaries. They queried whether regulations were sufficient to repeal the provisions of an Act. In any event, all additional information should be provided to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts so that this Committee would be in a position to consider this case again in the near future.

A Workers' member of Morocco noted that trade unions in his country were confronted with very exceptional circumstances. As concerns the employment of recruits in certain cases, he noted that his Government often used such measures to combat organised strikes. He also indicated that the work imposed on employees in the public sector was forced labour, incompatible with national laws and with this Convention.

The Government representative stated that the comments made by the Workers' member of Morocco should be verified. He noted two specific examples of strikes undertaken by the public health service and in the teaching sector. The former could reasonably be considered an essential service, yet no sanctions were taken against the trade union members. The reponsibility to continue this essential service, however, lay with the Government. Some trade unions always blamed the Government when a strike was unsuccessful.

A Workers' member of Greece welcomed the fact that the Workers' member of Morocco was able to attend the Conference, but pointed out that this was no enough. He noted that trade unions were often reproached for blaming governments for certain problems. Everyone had his own political opinions, but trade unionists first took care of the interests of the workers they represented. He added that often governments would do anything to break a strike if it was bothersome at the political level, including having recourse to scabs. No country lost when it dealt with its workers in a democratic manner. Governments were not the only representatives of their countries' interests. Workers also cared about the interests of their country and often a lot more that others.

The Committee noted the written and oral information provided by the Government. Since the Government had not reported within the prescribed time, the Committee did not feel it was able to discuss the substance fully without the Committee of Experts having made an assessment of the situation. It therefore hoped that the Government would report in detail the points raised by the Committee of Experts, in particular on the status of its intentions expressed over 20 years ago to amend the legislation so that the Conference Committee could consider the substance of the case at one of its next sessions.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). The Government has communicated the following information:

With reference to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning the practice of compulsory portering, the Government wishes to indicates that it is true that armed forces have to employ porters for transportation of equipment and things over difficult terrain in remote jungles and mountains near the frontiers where military campaigns against the armed insurgents are launched. Where the terrain is inaccessible by car or other motorised vehicles the Myanmar army has to employ porters for transport of supplies and equipment. However, it is not true that porters are treated harshly and inhumanely by the Myanmar armed forces. All these allegations about the treatment of porters by the armed forces are untrue. They mainly emanate from outside sources with ulterior political motives.

As a matter of fact, there are volunteer porters and professional porters who offer to work as porters on behalf of others to earn their living. Porters are recruited and employed by the armed forces after consultation with local authorities. This has been in practice in Myanmar since she regained her independence in 1948. Recruitment and employment are in accordance with section 8, subsection 1(n), of the Village Act of 1908 and section 7, subsection 1(m), of the Town Acts of 1907. Recruitment is based on the following three criteria:

(a) they must be unemployed;

(b) they must be physically fit to work as porters;

(c) a reasonable amount of wages must be fixed and agreed to beforehand.

Porters thus recruited are never required to accompany the troops to the actual scene of battles; neither are they exposed to danger. They are sent back as soon as their assignment is completed. They are paid equitably and in the unlikely event of a loss of life or limb unconnected with any armed conflict they or their families are compensated in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1925. They are entitled to medical treatment like soldiers in accordance with the Armed Force's Act. They are placed in safe places during operations.

In addition, a Government representative of Myanmar referred to written information provided by his Government and stressed that in his country there was no coercion with regard to the employment of workers. Comprehensive and elaborate laws effectively prevented the use of forced labour. In response to the allegations made against his Government that equated the use of porters by the armed forces of Myanmar with forced labour, he stressed that the use of porters was not the same as the use of forced labour. He said that the allegation emanated from outside sources who had ulterior political motives.

The Workers' members stated that they regretted hearing the Government representative say that there was no forced labour in Myanmar. They referred to the report of the Committee of Experts which had noted the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the application of the Convention in Myanmar. The ICFTU had indicated that the practice of compulsory portering was widespread and involved thousands of workers, who were forcibly recruited and harshly exploited. These porters were rarely paid, and were forced to carry excesive loads and endure physical hardship and danger. Some died as a result or were killed, sometimes during the course of military actions. They noted that the comments of the ICFTU were detailed and specific, and that it was customary for the Committee to rely on the accuracy of the Committee of Experts' reports. However, they acknowledged that there was a contradiction between the facts referred to in the report and the statement by the Government representative. They expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts would receive a detailed report on this matter.

The Employers' members stated that they would not go as far as the Workers' members in their assessment of the situation at the time. The Committee of Experts' comments had summarised serious allegations made against the Government, and the Government was responding to the request for its comments. Upon review, the Committee of Experts may decide that further information should be provided and make an explicit determination regarding the merits of their claims. They appreciated that the Government had cooperated by providing some information, and asked it to send any other relevant information to the Committee of Experts so that it might reach a conclusion as to whether or not the Convention had been contravened.

A Workers' member of France stated that he was a member of the organisation which had made the comments, and was surprised at the reaction of the Government representative. He emphasised that the ICFTU had provided all the elements of proof for this very serious case. He believed that the conclusions of the Committee should be pertinent and uncompromising with respect to the necessity to provide evidence of both the Government's will and practical measures that it would take to remedy a situation which he was certain continued to exist today.

The Government representative reiterated that the porters were not forced labour, which did not exist in his country. He stated that even if the employment of porters by the armed forces was considered to be forced labour, such porters had ceased to be employed by the military, because the Government was no longer conducting military campaigns. He stressed that the Government wished to establish national unity and peace, and to remove all differences by amicable discussion rather than fighting among the different races in his country.

The Workers' members disagreed with the observations made by the Employers' members, because in their view a presumption resulted from the fact that the Committee of Experts had set out the facts as stated in its report, and had expressed its hope that corrective measures would be taken. Although a written reply had been supplied by the Government beyond the prescribed time limit that had not been referred to in the report, it was similar in content, although more expansive than that to which the Government representative had related. They suggested that what had been stated in the Committee and the written reply be forwarded to the Committee of Experts for its evaluation and report.

The Committee noted that the Government had not supplied a report within the prescribed time. It also took note of the written and oral information given by the Government. In view of the seriousness of the allegations mentioned by the Committee of Experts, on the one hand, and the lack of reporting by the Government, on the other hand, it urged the Government to report in full to the ILO in the very near future.

Pakistan (ratification : 1957). Since the last meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has supplied legislative texts, particularly the law on debt bondage.

The Employers' members recalled that texts of new legislation, in particular, an Act to prohibit bonded labour, had recently been received and needed to be examined by the Committee of Experts. They indicated that the legislation would not be enough and that the implementation would be important. They suggested that the examination of this case be postponed until after the Committee of Experts have studied the texts in question.

Panama (ratification: 1966). The Government has supplied the following information:

As regards the comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government states that it has sent to the Ministry of Interior and Justice for its consideration, by means of a letter of 24 September 1991, a draft Bill which repeals and amends some articles of the Administrative Code as regards "forced labour" imposed under sentences rendered by Administrative Tribunals, with a view to making the legislation in conformity with the Convention.

This request was further reiterated by means of a letter of 28 May 1992, in which it has been requested to accelerate the measures for the submission of the draft Bill to the Legislative Assembly. The Government enclosed as annexes these letters and the draft Bill.

Peru (ratification: 1960). As concerned Convention No. 105, a Government representative, Vice-Minister of Labour, acknowledged the observation of the Committee of Experts and declared that the repeal, of section 44 from the Penal Code, was an important step in the history of his country.

As concerns Convention No. 29, forced labour was prohibited throughout the entire territory of the country and that practices which had been denounced by the National Federation of Miners, Metalworkers and Iron and Steelworkers of Peru (FNTMMSP) were illegal. The Constitution of Peru forbids these practices and they are punishible under the new Penal Code (Legislative Decree No. 635) of 1991. Although it was true that the Minister of Labour was not present throughout the national territory, periodic inspections were made.

Indigenous communities in Atalaya. The Multisectoral Committee created by Ministerial Resolution No. 083–88–PCM assigned, in its report, the following tasks to the Ministry of Labour: (1) preventative inspection of estates and settlements which were the subject of complaints; (2) the creation of the "work zone of Atalaya"; (3) the training of community spokespersons in the work issues and the publicising of labour standards in collaboration with indigenous organisations (Inter-ethnic Association for the Development of the Peruvian Forest and the Regional Organisation of Indigenous Communities of Atalaya). After the census of 1981, the 12,400 inhabitants were divided into different ethno–linguistic groups (Ashanicas, Campas, Shipibos, Conibos, Picos, Anahuacas and Yaminaguas) representing 80 indigenous communities which speak about 30 of the 52 dialects of the Peruvian Amazon. Unfortunately it had not been possible to give effect to the second and third activities set out by the Multisectoral Committee. Inspections carried out by the Ministry of Labour had not been more than had been conducted through an inquiry into the situation of 17 estates which were the subject of complaints; this had occurred because of the lack of cooperation by local authorities, the absence of employers and the lack of means. Other problems also existed in the Atalaya region such as land tenure, the invasion and colonisation of the area, and deforestation as well as human rights problems. The Ministerial Committee also proposed the intervention of other competent ministerial departments as well as approaching the ILO for the purpose of obtaining, with its collaboration, financing for technical assistance which would permit it to carry out well the tasks which had been assigned to it.

Workers in the Madre de Dios gold-mines and washeries. In August 1991 the Ministry of Labour constituted a commission charged with studying and finding a solution to the problem raised by the Committee of Experts in its observation. The Multisectoral Committee was charged to conduct an active training campaign to raise the consciousness of workers as to improving conditions of work. The employment bureaux which practise "enganche" were made the object of inspection visits and, in appropriate cases, were fined or ordered to close. The labour authority of Cuzoco took measures to ensure that labour contracts would be concluded in conformity with legal provisions in force and approved by them. Legal assistance for needy workers was provided with the assistance, in appropriate cases, of the police.

Unremunerated work by children in chestnut-peeling enterprises in Puerto Maldonado. Child labour was associated with poverty and a need by families to provide for basic survival. It was linked to family organisations and the mode of agricultural production, and was comparable to home work in urban areas. The work of chestnut peeling was task work where a set sum is paid for each kilogram of chestnuts peeled. Following collective bargaining, enterprises agreed to an increase in wages. Although the Peruvian legal system made provisions aimed at preventing the exploitation of children, it was clear that the critical poverty, misery and low standards of living that existed in regions of the country could not be eradicated or avoided only through legislation.

The Workers' members stated that there was clear progress in the case of Convention No. 105, whose application had been the subject of discussion since 1980 following the repeal of the former article 44 of the Penal Code. They hoped this Convention would be fully applied in practice in the future.

With regard to Conention No. 29, they pointed out that the legislation did not present any problems. As the Committee of Experts had pointed out since 1987, the problems raised by the National Federation of Miners, Metalworkers and Iron and Steelworkers of Peru concerned only its practical application. These problems were very serious since they shared a common feature – namely slavery, which necessitated efficient action wherever they arose. It was not sufficient that the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to provide information obtained from either the visits of labour inspectors or the work of various committees on forced labour. It was also necessary to require that concrete measures be taken to eliminate all use of forced labour as well as forced labour by children working in the chestnut-peeling enterprises in Puerto Maldonado (the Government's report did not touch on the subject although the Government representative recognised the existence of these practices and stated that they were poverty related). The Workers' members hoped that the Committee of Experts would examine the concrete measures taken in practice in order to ensure that progress is made in the coming year.

The Employers' members also underlined the seriousness of the problems relating to the application of Convention No. 29. These reprehensible practices existed as far back as 1960, when Peru originally ratified this Convention. These practices consisted of: obliging workers in the Madre de Dios gold-mines and washeries to stay permanently at their workplace situated in isolated areas because their employers' refusal to pay the cost of their return journeys, in violation of their obligations under the 90-day work contracts; the use of children to work alongside their mothers in the chestnut-peeling enterprises in Puerto Maldonado in order to fill the number of barrels of chestnuts that were required daily; the state of slavery of the indigenous communities of Atalaya, because they were subjected to the mechanisms of the system of "advances" or "enganche" provided by the employer in the form of work utensils, meals or money. Even though the Government representative stated that a new law had been adopted in 1991 providing for sanctions in cases of forced labour the Government had not send a report on Convention No. 81 on labour inspection, whose application was essential to the abolition of forced labour. It was necessary that the number of labour inspectors and the conditions under which they fulfilled their functions be in conformity with ILO Conventions on labour inspection in order to ensure the application of national legislation including those adapted in 1991. The Committee of Experts should keep this in mind in order to be able to assess the magnitude of the problems. The Employers' members requested that this case be discussed again next year with a view to ascertaining any progress made because of the serious nature of the problem involved.

Finally, the Employers' members noted with satisfaction the progress shown by the adoption of legislation applying Convention No. 105. However, they hoped that its practical application would supplement the guarantees provided by the Convention.

The Government representative stated that the new article 128 of the Penal Code of 1991 provided for imprisonment of two to four years for those endangering the lives of children under guardianship or custody. In other words, it was their own parents who, in order to increase their revenue, subjected their children to work without a contract. He added that labour inspection would ensure attaining the desired results and that the Government had sent to the Committee of Experts copies of decisions reprimanding enterprises engaging in forced labour. These decisions were complemented by political measures with a view to preventing such practices.

A Workers' member of Colombia expressed his concern with regard to the serious problems discussed relating to forced labour and children. These problems existed in Peru and in most Latin American countries as well as in the informal sector. Statements of good intent and adoption of laws did not suffice. One should equally take into account the problem of poverty, the deficient distribution of wealth, as well as the current economic system. He thought that at its next session this Committee should not limit itself to requiring reports of a political nature but should request specific information on measures taken to protect the rights of children.

The Committee noted with concern the violations of the Convention as reported by the Committee of Experts. It also noted the information supplied by the Government representative, but it regretted the existence in Peru of a situation which was not in conformity with the Convention. Even though the Committee had expressed its satisfaction with regard to progress attained on Convention No. 105, it had nevertheless underlined the seriousness of the current situation. It therefore urged the Government to provide the Committee with as much information as possible and to take all the necessary measures to end the above-mentionned violations. It underlined its decision to discuss this case once again at its next session.

Sudan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative stated that the observation of the Committee of Experts referred to allegations of the presence of "slaves and forced labour" in his country, which information it had previously received from the report of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in 1988 and 1989. He completely denied these allegations and repeated what his Government had emphasised during the Conference in 1989, namely that all Sudanese were totally free and had equal rights and duties. He stressed that his country prohibited any form or exercise of the slave trade and that in this connection his country did not feel obliged to provide any information since such practices did not exist in the first place. Furthermore, he issued an invitation to visitors from the United Nations or from the International Labour Organisation who so wished, to visit his country in order to verify that what he had said was true. Finally, he promised to provide a version of the Penal Code of 1990 in accordance with the request made by the Committee of Experts in its observation.

The Workers' members found the Government representative's reply to the request of the Experts to be unsatisfactory on various points. First of all, they noted that a report from the Government had not been received. Observations on this case had been made in 1989, 1990 and 1992 and this issue had been discussed at the Conference Committee in 1989. There was no difference between what the Government had said then and what the representative had stated in his declaration this year. From 1988 the Government had refuted the allegations contained in the United Nations documents concerning the capture and trade in slaves and referred to by the Committee of Experts' observation. Furthermore, the Government denied the more recent allegations contained in the report of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery of the United Nations Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of 19 August 1991 which concerned children kept in slavery and used as domestic servants and which was also mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its observation. The Government representative's statement that there were no cases of slavery taking place because of the existence of laws that prohibited slavery was not at all convincing. The Workers' members wondered what the national authorities were doing to enforce these laws. More specifically, they wanted to know, as did the Committee of Experts, whether people who were guilty of extracting forced labour had been arrested, found guilty and if penalties had been imposed on them. Finally, the Workers' members said that they were not very sure what the laws were at the time. Although the Government had referred in its previous report to sections 311 and 313 of the Penal Code, the Committee of Experts had been informed that a new Penal Code had been promulgated in 1991. However, the Committee of Experts had not had the opportunity of examing this law in order to determine whether it satisfied the requirements of the Convention. Consequently, they expressed the deepest possible dissatisfaction both with the failure to report on the Convention and on the nature of the reply given by the Government representative.

The Employers' members associated themselves very much with what the Workers' members had said. The Committee had been familiar with these very serious allegations for many years, which had emanated from two bodies in the United Nations both of which had carried out careful studies on the matter, and both of which had come to the conclusion that there was still a certain amount of trade in slaves carried out and that children were kept in slavery and used as domestic servants. The Government representative's argument that slavery had been outlawed through domestic legislation and that, as a result, the Government did not need to do anything more, was very feeble. On the contrary, the Government was duty bound to do considerably more and had an obligation to inform the Committee of Experts accordingly. The Government could not simply rely on a law which contained a prohibition on forced labour but had to ensure that such practices no longer actually existed. Three years ago, the Committee of Experts, as well as this Committee, had asked for the necessary measures to be taken so that a satisfactory situation might be reached. However, three years later nothing had changed at all and, in view of the gravity of the allegations, this was a very regrettable situation. Moreover, the provisions of the Penal Code of 1988 needed to be reviewed but there was also the matter of the new text of the Penal Code of 1991. However, since the Government had not complied with its reporting obligation, this Committee was lacking information. All in all, this was a situation which constituted a serious infringment of the Convention.

The Workers' member from Sudan stated that the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts had been taken from a book whose contents had been criticised by the Workers' Federation of Sudan. His Federation's members had visited the region that was referred to in the book and had not encountered a single case that could be regarded as slavery. The whole issue of using children as slaves arose when there was a rebellion in the country. This issue was raised in the Organization of African Unity's Labour Committee in April 1991. This Committee adopted a unanimous resolution denouncing the rebellion that had taken place in southern Sudan since it involved the kidnapping of 15 children who were in fact used as domestic servants but, apart from this case, his organisation was not aware of any other case involving slavery. He assured the Committee that, if there were such a case, there would have been a general uprising against the Government. Finally, he invited the members of the Committee to go and see for themselves what was actually happening in this area in Sudan.

The Government representative reiterated that there were no demonstrated cases of slavery in Sudan. He indicated that he would be happy to provide a text of the Penal Code of 1991 to the ILO so that the Committee could take note of its contents.

The Workers' members stated that to visit the country would not add to the case in any sense whatsoever since the members of this Committee were not emissaries themselves but that it was the Committee of Experts who dealt with the information provided by the Government. Moreover, it was the Office that sometimes assisted countries who were unable to fulfil their obligations under the Convention. Because of the very serious nature of the case and the persistent refusal by the Government to deal with the points raised by both the Committee of Experts and by this Committee, they felt that this case required a special paragraph.

The Employers' members expressed that it was for the Government to say whether, and to what extent, its obligations were being fulfilled under this Convention. In order to highlight the urgency of the case and to emphasise this Committee's concern that the situation was not improving, they also believed that a special paragraph would make it clear to the Government that the Committee felt that it should finally act.

The Workers' member of Sudan stressed that he should not be blamed for trying to assist his Government. Moreover, this was not the case since he had been speaking on behalf of the workers of Sudan because this was a serious issue which concerned the forced labour of children.

The Government representative, in response to the comments made by the Workers' and Employers' members, indicated that all the information requested by this Committee would be submitted by his Government most diligently. His Government had agreed to have this case discussed because it had wanted to cooperate with this Committee. Although his Government would not mind having a special paragraph included in the Committee's report, he felt this would merely complicate matters further. He added that the Workers' member of Sudan had expressed his own views freely.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands indicated that Workers' members were free to express their views and to assist their governments just as certain Employers' members were free to do the same in other sittings of this Committee.

The Committee noted that the Committee of Experts had not been in a position to consider the situation as the Government had not sent a report. The Committee also noted the oral information given by the Government. It expressed its deep dissatisfaction, taking into account that no progress seemed to have been made since it discussed this case some years ago. It was under the impression that the Government confined itself to a simple denial of slavery existing in the country. In that respect, it felt bound to remind the Government that various United Nations bodies had reported on such cases and that the Conference Committee could not but consider those allegations not to be completely unfounded, as long as the Government did not report in full on the existing situation. It therefore expressed the hope, in the strongest possible terms, that the Government would send in such a report. It felt bound, in view of the very serious matter under discussion on the one hand, and the Government's attitude as mentioned before on the other hand, to set these conclusions in a special paragraph of the Report.

United Republic of Tanzania (ratification: 1962). A Government representative reiterated that which it had already stated last year, to the effect that in practice there was no forced labour per se in his country. The national Constitution prohibited forced labour, and the constitutional amendment which will enter into force on 1 July 1992 will include legislative changes. A draft Bill will be submitted to the National Assembly during its next session, which will amend certain existing anomalies in order to ensure the conformity of the legislation with the Convention. He pointed out that a copy of the draft had been supplied to the ILO and that it was not appropriate, as the draft had not been adopted, to discuss its contents in detail. He assured the Committee that his Government intended to comply with all the instruments which it had ratified. He indicated that the constitutional amendments had brought about fundamental changes relating to Convention No. 87, which had not been ratified by his country.

The Workers' members recalled that at the preceding Conference the Government had acknowledged that the observations of the Committee of Experts were justified, and promised to amend the legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention. A new Act on unemployment should have been submitted to the National Assembly in December of last year; the report of the Committee of Experts indicated that the Government had not supplied any information in respect of this matter. The Workers' members requested the Government representative to specify whether or not the Government had sent the ILO the draft of this Act. In 1971, 1980 and 1981 this case had been included in special paragraphs of the reports of this Committee. In its report of this year, the Committee of Experts had reiterated the comments which had been made for a number of years, and had summarised the situation in the following manner: "The Committee cannot but express its concern at the institutionalised and systematic compulsion to work established in law at all levels, from the national Constitution through Acts of Parliament to District by-laws". The Committee also referred in its report to new legislative texts of 1989 and 1990 which established a policy of forced participation, that was referred to as community development. This indicated that the provisions that were contrary to the Convention had not only not been repealed, but had also been confirmed, and that this situation truly concerned them, given the seriousness of these problems. They regretted that the information had not been supplied on time so that the Experts could have examined and indicated its view of the state of the legislation. They hoped that the conclusions would be as firm as possible.

The Employers' members considered that they were in the same situation as in the previous year, the only difference being that perhaps a copy of the legislation had been supplied to the ILO. They considered that the Committee was dealing with important questions relating to Convention No. 29, such as the general obligation to work and forced labour for the purposes of development and public works. They did not clearly understand whether a draft of the new Labour Code had been sent to the ILO which would modify various Acts, including the Human Resources Employment Act and the Resettlement of Offenders Act. They regretted that the Committee of Experts had not received the information that was necessary to make an observation on this case. They emphasised that this case had been discussed for a decade, and that the result remained the same.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that he wished to ask the Government representative the same question which he had raised 15 years ago when this case had been discussed: what problems did the Government have in changing the law? He recalled that on several occasions the ILO had sent technical assistance to Tanzania in order to resolve the case. The Government representative had stated that there was no forced labour in Tanzania; in the past, many promises had been made about the changes that would occur. He asked why the Government would be able this year to fulfil the promises which it had not been able to fulfil in previous years.

The Government representative, in response to the questions raised, stated that an interministerial technical committee was responsible for the consolidation of three labour Acts which would revoke the Employment Ordinance No. 366 of 1952 as amended. This project was suspended while modifications of the Constitution were taking place, so that the necessary changes in the draft could be introduced. The copy of the draft had been sent to the ILO approximately two months ago, and his Government was waiting for the comments of the Office as well as the comments of the workers' union which had been re-established as a free trade union. He hoped that the draft would be submitted to the National Assembly during its next session in October of this year.

A Workers' member of Liberia asked if there were any Workers' delegates from Tanzania on the Committee who could provide testimony as to the truth of the statements of the Government representatives. He asked the Government to encourage the participation of trade unions so that they could participate on the Committee and clarify several aspects of the discussion. The Government representative reiterated that the draft had not been submitted to the National Assembly in the period during which the constitutional amendments were being undertaken. He stated that his Government was at the same time providing the free trade union movement, that had been established effective 1 December, 1919, with the opportunity to make observations, comments and suggestions that it considered necessary for inclusion in the draft.

The Committee took due note of the information supplied by the Government representative. It stated that it was distressed at the lack of progress that had been made on the subject-matter which had been discussed by the Committee for very many years. It understood that the constitutional amendments had delayed the materialisation of the intention expressed by the Government to amend its legislation. It also noted that a Bill to amend those laws would be tabled before Parliament during its next session, which would start in the spring of 1993. It strongly urged the Government to take all measures to bring that Bill before Parliament shortly, and to send a copy of the same to the ILO at the same time, in order that the Committee could once again study the situation at its next session.

Thailand (ratification: 1969). A Government representative indicated that concerning the problem of the lack of enforcement of laws for the protection of children, the Government had paid a lot of attention to the problem and set up an ad hoc police team in the Department of Police, Ministry of the Interior, which is responsible for inspecting and supervising workplaces suspected to hire children illegally, and for prosecuting employers violating the Labour Protection Law, the civil, commercial and criminal codes. During the exercise of the investigation and of the prosecution, the police team cooperated with the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Welfare in assisting children at workplaces and rehabilitating children before sending them home. For example, an employer of a papercup factory was prosecuted on the grounds of 15 unfair labour practices, and the children rescued from this factory were either sent home or provided with necessary information to find jobs or obtained training at the Skill Development Institute of the Department of Labour. As regards notification No. 12 of January 1990 of the Ministry of the Interior to strengthen the protection of working children from being victims of illegal treatment, the Department of Labour in cooperation with the police department prosecuted 14 employers during the past seven months. In addition, the Government took the following measures to eliminate exploitation and illegal use of child labour:

(i) A Bill to protect children by raising the sanction of imprisonment from six months to five years was still in the process of submission to the National Assembly, the delay being the result of the recent political situation in the country.

(ii) A proposal to revise the Act on employment service and jobseekers' protection (B.E.2528.) with a view to raising the prison term from six months to up to six years for child abductors and illegal recruiters of employment agencies, was also in the process of submission to the new Cabinet.

(iii) As regards the request made on 5 November 1991 by the Ministry of the Interior to the Bangkok Metropolitan Administration and the Ministry of Public Health to order hospitals to gather names of patients who have suffered injuries caused by improper working conditions or physical abuse, and to report to the Department of Labour, no report had so far been received. The request, however, would be followed up regularly.

(iv) The hotline established by the Department of Labour to receive communications on possible abuse of children at worksites had been frequently used and almost 200 cases were reported during the last six months through this line.

(v) Following the decentralisation of the Department of Labour's administrative structure in the Bangkok area since mid-February 1992 which split the area into 36 sub-local areas, the inspection work had become more efficent, as shown in the statistics: 802 inspections in fiscal 1991, opposed to 1,283 in seven months so far of 1992; 725 inspections in March-April showing a 50 per cent increase in the same period of the previous year. The report of the city officials and local labour administrators, however, had not so far reached the Ministry.

(vi) Not only the Ministry of the Interior but also the public prosecutor and the Ministry of Justice were taking further steps to intensify the control over child abuse, the penalties for torturing children had been raised from three years' imprisonment to 20 years as was the case of the papercup maker, or up to the death sentence or lifelong imprisonment in a case of the loss of the victim's life.

(vii) The Department of Labour provided an information service for young jobseekers in rural areas who wanted to work in Bangkok or in urban areas. They were advised to consult provincial labour offices set up throughout the country. Moreover, the Ministry of the Interior established the prevention and protection centre for child labourers within the Department of Labour, which receives and provides information 24 hours a day and coordinates all kinds of media to disseminate information to the public.

(viii) The Department of Labour set up a programme to combat child labour with the assistance of the ILO and the International Programme of the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), which was expected to start next month.

(ix) The Government's policy to extend the elementary education from grade 6 to grade 9 was now being conducted on a voluntary basis, due to financial constraint, but the Government aimed to introduce compulsory education up to age 15 (grade 9) free of charge in the future.

(x) The Prime Minister repeated his statement made during the ILO Regional Conference that "the place for a child was in school and not in a factory" later in a Cabinet meeting, calling for efforts by all the government agencies to this end. A draft apprenticeship Bill submitted to the former Cabinet was at present under revision, but was expected to be taken up by the new Cabinet once formed.

(xi) As regards the decentralisation of the authority of the Department of Labour in the Bangkok area, which is the largest labour market in the country, the state employment service agencies were expanding services accordingly, and private employment agencies were also inspected and supervised.

(xii) When complaints are received in the Department of Labour, in particular through the hotline, the officer of the Department would go to the place immediately with the police of the area or officers of the ad hoc police team, and employers breaching the laws would be prosecuted immediately, the children thus rescued would be sent for rehabilitation both in health and mental conditions before being sent back home or receiving vocational guidance and training as they wish.

(xiii) The Government provided the same protection as nationals to foreign children who illegally reside in Thailand and is making efforts to prevent illegal immigration by punishing employment agencies and any persons involved in this respect.

In conclusion, the speaker indicated that her Government had taken all the necessary measures and that the situation was getting better.

The Workers' members recalled that this extremely distressing case regarding forced labour exploitation of children, including prostitution and pornography, had been pending for many years including a long discussion and a special paragraph last year. They acknowledged the effort by the Government to supply information requested by the Committee of Experts and an increasing awareness since last year by the Prime Minister who stated that it was not sufficient to wait for economic restructuring to redress this exploitation of child labour. They expressed surprise, in view of the seriousness of the case, that the Minister himself would not come to this Committee and address the situation. While the report of the Committee of Experts observed that the measures taken were not commensurate with the gravity of the problem, the Workers' members noted the measures indicated by the Government representative as a large step forward since last year on this important issue. They addressed two questions: first, whether the Government had put into practice the particular statement of policy made at the Asian Regional Conference; second, whether the Government would accept a direct contacts mission by the ILO to assist them in this extremely grave problem.

The Employers' members recalled that the case had been examined since 1985, was the subject of a special paragraph in 1991 and concerned all the forms of abuse of children: exploitation by work, prostitution, pornography and sale. The Committee of Experts referred to this statement by the Prime Minister who expressed the intention to redress the exploitation of children and to the measures which the Government had the intention to take, under strong pressure from ouside, including the Committee. The measures indicated were so far only the statements of intention and did not seem sufficient to redress this serious problem. The Employers' members considered that the Government representative did not supply, except for some points, any new information, while the questions by the Committee of Experts concerned the measures of practical application in very specific areas such as inspection, police action, collusion berween the expoloiters and the police under certain circumstances. The Employers' members expressed their grave preoccupation at the seriousness of the case, considering that the measures taken were far too hesitant: they requested further efforts and hoped that the Government would furnish detailed information in a written report.

A Workers' member of Switzerland, noting that the Government seemed to be conscious that measures should be taken to put an end to child labour without waiting for economic restructuring, stated that it was essential that the Conventions be respected independent from the efforts for the development and from economic crisis, and that the ILO should ensure that international economic competition should not be made by damping working conditions and by exploitation of the most vulnerable. To force children to work, to force them to prostitution and to pornography are particularly serious forms of forced labour. Prostitution was all the more atrocious today because it often meant a death sentence to the child by contamination of sexually transmissible diseases, in particular of AIDS. The criminal groups who made sale of children, often across the border, behaved with brutality and even corrupted the police. The speaker considered that the programme of repression mentioned was not sufficient and requested the Government to indicate the measures contemplated to stop the tourism depending on the sacrifice of children. Noting that the countries where those tourists come from had their responsibility in the fight against the exploitation of children, she considered that Thailand should encourage other countries to participate in the efforts to eliminate the basis itself of sexual exploitation.

A Government member of Germany, recalling the discussion in the Committee in 1991 followed by a special paragraph and noting with interest the measures indicated by the report of the Committee of Experts, considered that the responses were not sufficient in comparison with what was expected and that further information was necessary. Meanwhile, the Government recognised the problem and indicated that measures should be taken and the IPEC programme would help the adoption of concrete measures to redress this scourge.

A Workers' member of Pakistan supported the statement by the Workers' spokesman and, noting the efforts made by successive governments, urged that concrete measures be taken to eliminate the evil of exploitation of child labour, not only by enforcing civil and penal sanctions but also by providing more social and economic input, such as education, to help the exploited children and their families. He hoped that the technical programme launched by the ILO would help the Government and that the Government should have a more particular will to eliminate this evil.

A Workers' member of Greece stated that there was nothing worse than "economic" activity which developed by practically murdering children. The Government was ready to take measures, and the report of the Committee of Experts mentioned projects, proposals, a case of arrest, and imprisonment of three to seven years. This was not the way to eliminate the forced labour of children. The speaker wished to see the results of the measures taken by the Government. He stated that as long as children of ten years or less were exploited and imprisoned in brothels and in factories, the Committee should clearly and severely express its opinion, and the case would merit a special paragraph to condemn this situation disgraceful to humanity.

A Workers' member of Senegal stated that the competitiveness of products made in a country like Thailand, in violation of the labour legislation, would have negative repercussions on the workers of other developing countries.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated, concerning the action by the ILO for the protection of children, that in November 1992 there would be a workshop, organised by the ILO in the framework of the Interdepartmental Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour. This workshop would examine the situation of servitude in which many children find themselves, and would above all explore possible practical solutions for the countries concerned. This workshop would be organised in cooperation wiht the Centre for Human Rights of the United Nations and with UNICEF. It would involve a number of Asian countries, including Thailand.

The Government representative welcomed all the observations made. She indicated that all measures she had mentioned would take time to reach the objectives, and requested the cooperation of other countries in the efforts to suppress the demand for sex tours referred to during the debate. As regards the direct contacts mission, which she would personally welcome, she wished to consult her Government and to report subsequently to the ILO.

The Workers' members expressed a feeling of revulsion on this case which they considered not only as "one of the worst" but as "the worst form of exploitation". They welcomed the statement made by the representative of the Secretary-General that the ILO was well aware of this problem and was going to make efforts to tackle it. They hoped that the Government representative would convey to her Government the magnitude and the gravity of the problem which requires exceptional efforts focused not on legislation alone but also on practical measures undertaken and urged again for a favourable response by the Government as regards the ILO direct contacts.

The Employers' members considered that there was large agreement to express serious preoccupations as regards the situation in Thailand. They urged that measures taken should be reinforced and extended and that the Government fight by all means against this very grave situation and that it reply in detail to the questions by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative which it seemed reiterated mostly the points mentioned in the Government's reports to the ILO dating from four months ago, which the Committe of Experts pointed out in its latest report. It recalled that it had been discussing this case already for several years, i.e. the different forms of misuse of children. Although it welcomed the present attitude of the Government, it felt bound to underline the Committee of Experts' views that much more is to be done in order to end the appalling situation mentioned. It therefore requested the Government to take all the necessary steps, either in the legislative field or as far as the implementation and enforcement of laws are concerned, with a view to putting an end to the situation in the country which extremely distressed the Committee. It suggested strongly that the Government ask the ILO for technical assistance or sending a direct contacts mission and hoped that the Government will supply a report about the different points raised by the Committee of Experts at its earliest convenience in order that the Committee can make a full assessment of the situation at its next session.

Convention No. 35: Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933

Chile (ratification: 1935). A Government representative, the Under-Secretary of Social Welfare, pointed out, that, as already indicated to the Committee of Experts, the pension system had been reformed in 1980. This reform was made because the old system of social insurance presented great difficulties due to its rigidity causing injustice. Under the old scheme, the largest pension fund in Chile was the Social Security Fund to which Chilean workers paid contributions and received benefits when reaching the age of 65 years for men and 55 years for women, while workers could contribute to pension funds being able to receive benefits after a certain number of years, for example, 24 years in the case of bank employees. This led to a number of situations where certain sectors were privileged as compared to others. During different periods of Government, attempts were made to reform this system but the privileged few blocked any changes. The Government was also led to change the system because there was a considerable deficit. Legislative Decree No. 3500 of 1980 established a new pension system, replacing the old system of distribution with the system of individual capital accumulation. This new scheme was funded by monthly contributions which the employer deducted from workers' wages. While the contributions came solely from the workers, the legislation permitted employers and workers to agree to a voluntary contribution by the employer in order to improve the amount of pension or permit early retirement. The Legislative Degree provided for an increase in workers' wages to cover the increase in contribution. Such agreements could be either individual or collective. Even though the new system established a pension scheme funded solely by workers' contributions, this did not mean that the workers' take-home pay was reduced in any way nor did it mean an increased cost to the employer as this was simply a question of accounting. As concerns the participation of the Government in the contribution to the resources of the funds of the obligatory pension scheme, section 73, et seq. of the Legislative Decree established the guarantee by the State (for those who have completed the requisite number of years of service) of a minimum old-age pension, thus making the necessary funds available when the contributions accumulated by the worker were not sufficient. As concerns Article 10, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention, Legislative Decree No. 19069 of 1991 established as one of the main objectives of trade union organisations, federations, confederations and central organisations to constitute or participate in the constitution of pension-type funds or to associate with pension funds or health-insurance institutions which permitted them, therefore, to participate directly in the management of such funds. It was no longer necessary for trade unions to create anonymous societies, but now workers could participate directly and actively in the management of their pension funds not only as users, but also as administrators of their own funds. The speaker considered that, with the adoption of this new provision, his Government was fully in conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' members noted that this case had already been dealt with in the Conference Committee in previous years and that several observations had been made by the Committee of Experts. Furthermore, in 1984, a representation had been examined by a committee created by the Governing Body, which made recommendations to the Government. The real problem with respect to the application of this Convention was the reform leading to the privatisation of the pension insurance scheme. Even given the information provided by the Government, the comments made by the Committee of Experts were still valid. Two of the Committees comments concerned the financing of the system. The Committee of Experts had noted that almost all of the contributions to the fund were made by the workers and there was no contribution on the part of the employers. Furthermore, the State did not provide sufficient financial contribution. On two other points, the Committee of Experts had noted that the workers were not able to participate actively in the management of the system and that the institutions should not be profit-making. They noted that no progress had been made since this case had been discussed several years ago. They urged the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts and to review the recommendations made by the Committee set up by the Governing Body. Such action would be necessary to ensure the practical application of the pension insurance scheme in compliance with the Convention.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been discussed a number of years ago and that four major points had been raised by the Committee of Experts. The first concerned the lack of employers' contributions to old-age insurance. They understood that the Convention provided that employers' contributions were necessary only if the insurance was compulsory for workers. They therefore requested the Government to provide further information on this point. As concerns the increase in wages to take into account contributions made by workers, they noted that, over time, this increase had very little real value. They recalled that, according to the Government, the state guarantee with respect to the entire fund replied to the question of state contribution. Furthermore, the Government had indicated that this guarantee was frequently made use of by people taking early retirement. They requested the Government to provide more detailed information on this question so that it could be fully examined. While noting that the Convention strictly prohibited the administration of insurance schemes by profit-making institutions, they wondered whether this Convention, which was adopted in 1933, reflected present-day views in this regard. Clearly, profit benefited the insurees. Of course, speculation with risk of loss should not be permitted. Nevertheless the state guarantee would ensure that there was no loss. In any event, the prohibition of profit-making institutions was quite clear in the Convention. Finally, they noted that the participation of workers in the management of the fund would depend upon the structure of the insurance system. Once again they requested the Government to supply more detailed information so that the Committee of Experts could determine whether the minimum requirements of participation had been met.

A Workers' member of the United States referred to the Workers' and Employers' members' statements and noted that there had been no substantial progress in this case. He suggested that a complete restructuring of the system was needed and requested the Government to carefully consider this alternative when replying to the questions raised by the Workers' and Employers' members.

The Workers' member of Chile pointed out that ever since the system of individual capital accumulation replaced the system of repartition, the workers of his country had expressed a number of concerns which are also reflected in the report of the Committee of Experts. In particular, the workers wanted to manage their own funds. In this regard, he recognised that some progress had been made with the new legislation which enabled workers to create associations for the management of pension funds. He expressed the hope, however, that the legislation would be further revised to enable the workers themselves to be the administrators of pension funds or directly participate in the management of such funds. Furthermore, under the new system, the number of years actually necessary for the right to a pension at retirement was 65 without taking into account the years of service. This is different from the earlier scheme which provided for different ages of retirement. As the speaker considered that this retirement age was excessively high, he noted that a contribution from employers would be useful in order to reduce the actual working period required before retirement. Finally, the speaker noted that the two systems were actually coexisting. The repartition system consisted of workers who had decided not to affiliate with the new scheme and who had continued to contribute to the former centralised system under which contributions higher than for those affiliated to the new system had to be paid. On the other hand, workers who found themselves integrated in the new scheme were confronted with the problems noted in the Committee of Experts' report. They urged the Government, therefore, to review the situation with a view to solving the problems of workers retiring in their country.

A Workers' member of Argentina associated himself with the concerns raised by the Workers' member of Chile. These concerns were shared by everyone since the type of system was beginning to spread in Argentina and all of Latin America. He expressed his doubts concerning the funtioning of the new system since the workers could not participate in the management of their own funds and these was no guarantee as to what would happen to these funds at a time when these countries were facing serious economic difficulties. Furthermore, as could be noted in his own country, these funds were not generally invested for the benefit of the national economic and social development. Often, these funds were invested in other countries. The manner in which these funds were being used now and would be used in the future was unknown.

The Government representative pointed out, in reply to the questions raised, that a radical change in the pension system had taken place in his country and that the Government wished to maintain this system and make the changes necessary for its perfection. A decision was taken that the worker would make contributions to the pension funds since it was to his benefit. With the implementation of the new scheme, a worker would continue to receive the same wage previously paid to him by the employer and the employer would pay exactly the same as he was paying previously. The difference was simply a matter of accountancy. The worker now had the right to choose the pension fund which granted the best guarwantees and security whereas under the old system the worker was required to affiliate with a specific fund regardless of the advantages it provided. The new scheme is not a private pension system but rather a public system which the legislation by means of a commission on the classification of risks and the determination of where investments could be made. The instruments, which were deposited in the Central Bank of Chile, could not be handled in an arbitrary fashion. If part of the funds were invested abroad, this operation had to be based upon certain guarantees and had to be in compliance with the requirements which ensured full security and the necessary profitability so that workers could benefit in the future from a higher pension. Today, pensioners under the old scheme benefited from a minimum pension and it was hoped that, with the income of these funds, the pension levels would be be raised. As an alternative, an authorisation had been given to invest annually a certain percentage of the funds abroad. The increase in the amount of the funds would lead to the necessity of finding new possibilities for investment in the country. At present, regulations concerning investments were being drawn up by the commission on risk-classifications so that the funds could be invested in projects which would assure the necessary security and profitability. As concerns participation in management of the funds, the changes brought about by Legislative Decree No. 19069 of 1991 enabled trade union organisations to constitute their own administrative associations for pension funds without the previous requirement of creating an anonymous society. The present public system, which permitted regulated private administrations, would enable workers to obtain an adequate pension in relation to their contributions by providing the possibility of voluntary savings. With respect to the age-limit of 65 for men and 60 for women in order to obtain pension benefits, this age-limit was established only as concerns the state guarantee, but if a worker had the sufficient capital necessary to obtain a pension which was 10 per cent higher than the minimum he could retire at any age. There were two coexisting pension systems in his country which meant a high cost for the State. In replacing the repartition system, the Government had undertaken the cost of the contributions by paying the pensions of the previous scheme. At the same time, the State assumed the obligation to pay a "recognition bond" for the contributions made by workers who had changed from the old system to the new one. Finally, he recognised that he was speaking about a system which was different from that required by the Convention and therefore he understood the reason for the comments made by the Committee of Experts. He reiterated that there now existed a state system which permitted the direct participation of workers in the management of pension funds.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government with some disappointment in view of the fact that the subject-matter had been previously under discussion in the present Committee. It felt that the progress made in meeting the suggestions of the Committee of Experts was not sufficient. The Committee therefore urged the Government to change its legal system as indicated in the Committee of Experts' report and recalled the possibility of ILO assistance in this regard.

Convention No. 42: Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) (Revised), 1934

Guyana (ratification: 1966). The Government has communicated the following information:

Based on the assistance and advice received from the ILO, discussions were held with the National Insurance Scheme and recommendations have been put up for consideration by the Government.

The suggestions of the Committee of Experts contained in paragraphs (a) – (f) of its observation, and the references to poisoning caused by arsenic and benzene were considered.

Convention No. 52: Holidays with Pay, 1936

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). A Government representative declared that a detailed report had already been sent to the Committee of Experts in April 1991 and that the Government recognised the rightfulness of the obeservations of that Committee in respect of this Convention. A draft text to modify article 129(2) of the Labour Code had been submitted to the competent legislative authorities which however had not adopted it due to political problems in the country at that time. Nevertheless, the Government, the social partners and labour specialists are unanimous in recognising that the Labour Code elaborated immediately after independence has become obsolete and that it should be urgently brought up to date. Article 129(2) is not applied in practice; it was adopted because at the time communications were difficult and a person working far away from his home had difficulties to return home in order to benefit from his holidays; the legislature then thought it better to give a possibility to workers to accumulate their holidays and in order to spend more time with their families. In practice, however, workers always got the number of days of holidays provided by the law and they use them as they wish, if there are no other contractual arrangements. The global revision of the Labour Code, including article 129(2) will be made. The Government would contact the ILO in this respect.

The Workers' members observed, firstly, that the Committee of Experts has made a number of observations for many years; secondly, that there was a discussion on this question in previous years, including last year, and with a special paragraph in the report in 1981; and, thirdly, that there was no progress in conjunction with the Experts' comments. The basic problem, which is described in their report, is the exclusion of many workers from the right to holidays because of the requirement to fulfil the qualifying period which can be of up to 30 months; this situation may concern a great number of workers in view of the traditional use of contract of employment of a limited duration. If the intentions of the Government to revise the Labour Code would become concrete, there would be progress, but as of now there are only declarations. The Government must now proceed to the revision of the Code and transmit to the ILO the texts of the modified laws. It is to be hoped that this Committee would be able to note progress next year.

The Employers' members underlined that the Government representative recognised without ambiguity that the observations of the Committee were well founded, declared that he was determined to follow the recommendations of the supervisory bodies and wanted to meet with the secretariat to discuss the necessary modifications in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee, taking note with regret the information supplied by the Government, understood that the Government started the process of amending the Labour Code to comply with the requirements of the Convention. Recalling that this case has been reported for many years, the Committee urgently asked the Government to send the text of the drafted amendments to the ILO at its earliest convenience. It furthermore urged the Government to keep the ILO informed of any progress made in the process of changing the existing regulations on this subject in order that the Committee will be able to conclude that the legislation is in complete conformity with the Convention at one of its next sessions.

Côte d'Ivoire: (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that since 1984 his country had been revising its Labour Code in order to bring it into full conformity with ratified Conventions and take into account comments of the Committee of Experts. In this reform, article 108 of the Labour Code concerning holidays with pay had been modified to take into account Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. During this period, holidays had been accorded to all workers without consideration of nationality. Unfortunately, the Labour Advisory Committee, which was a tripartite body charged with examining the draft revised Labour Code, had to suspend its work at the request of the Committee on Competitiveness – another tripartite body charged by the Government to make labour market regulations more flexible within the context of structural adjustment. In March 1992 the draft was given to a technical committee of the Ministry of Employment and Public Service for re-examination so that it could be submitted to Parliament by the end of the year.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had implicitly recognised that the country's current legislation was not in conformity with the Convention. This divergence had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts since at least 1987; the Government representative himself had indicated that his country had been in the process of revising a Labour Code for eight years. Difficulties resulting from the intervention of various bodies in this revision process did not alter the fact that there was a need to correct application of this Convention, which was ratified 30 years ago. The Government representative should convey to his Government the Committee's strong feeling that the relevant legislation should be modified quickly. The ILO should be kept informed in a detailed and written manner in this regard.

The Workers' members joined the Employers' members in emphasising that this case had been the subject of the Committee of Experts' comments for many years. For still as many years the Government had repeated that it was in the process of revising its legislation with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. It did not appear that the bringing of national legislation into conformity with Conventions long ago ratified was a government priority. When it came to drafts concerning holidays with pay, it was not right that, in practice, an important category of workers could be excluded from the right to holidays; this was now the case. The Workers' members did not wish to be provided once again with the same information but wanted clear undertakings by the Government with respect to the Convention.

The Government representative wished to clarify that all workers, national or not, benefited from a paid annual leave of one month. The leave of two months provided for expatriates, a period which took into account delays in travelling to and from home, had been supressed because it no longer had a reason for being.

The Committee regretted to note that the labour legislation was still not in conformity with the Convention. In view of the fact that this situation had existed for many years it reminded the Government of the possibility of technical assistance to be given by the ILO. It expected the Government to change the regulations and bring them into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible and hoped to be able to take note of same at its next session.

Convention No. 55: Shipowners' Liability (Sick and Injured Seamen), 1936

Panama (ratification: 1971). A Government representative of Panama indicated that the draft Bill No. 15 on labour in the maritime environment was drafted with the technical assistance of the ILO at the end of the 1980s and received the approval of the highest authorities of the Executive Body before going to the Legislative Assembly. After consultation with all parties involved, this draft bill went through a first debate before the competent parliamentary Commission. One had to wait for the debates in the Plenary of the Legislative Assembly to be finished in order to pass this bill. Following consultation with the tripartite Commission which drafted the bill, the Minister of Labour was ready to propose the introduction of the necessary amendments recommended by the Committee of Experts not only on this Convention, but on all others which bore upon labour matters at sea.

The Employers' members pointed out the positive elements in the observation of the Committee of Experts and in the intervention of the Government representative. Among the points raised by the Committee of Experts, some were relatively less important, for example, the definition of the term "vessel" or the question of the shipowners' liablity in the event of accidents attributable to the sailor. As regards the qualification of the words "reasonable" of medical costs whose deletion the Committee of Experts advocated, this seemed to be a simple nuance. The Government which was ready to envisage these amendments seemed to be proceeding along the right lines.

The Workers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had made observations since 1983 on this case which had also been discussed by this Committee in 1987 and 1988. Since 1982 the Government spoke of a Bill which would comply with all the provisions of the Convention. In 1988 this Committee noted that no progress had been made in this respect. This year the Committee of Experts took note of a Bill which would put an end to the violations of the Convention and the Government representative confirmed that this Bill was going to be adopted. It would be appropriate to hope that there would be real progress made as stated by the Government report and confirmed by the Committee of Experts. The Workers' members were particularly concerned with the respect of Conventions on Seafarers as they showed during the examination two years ago in the General Survey of 1990 on labour standards in merchant shipping. That was why the violations that still existed had to be redressed shortly.

The Government representative thanked the Employers' members and the Workers' members for their declarations and assured them that they could count on the legislative procedure which would lead to the adoption of draft Bill No. 15. He confirmed that his Government would present the amendments recommended by the Committee of Experts to the Legislative Assembly.

A Workers' member of Italy stated that Panamanian ships were known for the frequency of their accidents as well as for the incidents of exploitation of foreign workers on board. That was why the compliance by Panama of the Convention was of the utmost importance.

The Committee took due note of the information supplied by the Government representative from which it understood that a Bill to change the legislation was before Parliament and that it would in all probability be adopted soon. It hoped that the Government would report in detail to the ILO as soon as this Bill had been passed so that it could conclude that the legislation was in full conformity with the Convention at-one of its next sessions.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection , 1947

Bolivia (ratification: 1973). The Government communicated the following information:

Article 5 of the Convention. In order to give effect to this Article, the Government established the policy of maintaining ongoing dialogue and consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations in the country. Furthermore, in order to encourage and spread the role to be played by the national inspection services, the following events and actions will be planned and carried out with the co-operation of the Latin American Labour Administration Centre based in Lima, Peru (CIAT):

(a) A seminar on inspection was organised with the participation of three experts from the ILO and was attended by inspectors from all over the country. This seminar dealt with the following themes: labour legislation, inspection procedures and forms, conciliation, mediation, arbitration and an analysis of inspection in Bolivia. The results were excellent and it was made clear that an inspector must have a wide perspective on labour relations in the present ever-changing society and economy.

(b) Along the same lines, a seminar on occupational safety and health was held for inspectors of the relevant division, and trade union leaders concerning the means of prevention and control of occupational accidents, and on working conditions in industrial establishments.

(c) A national awareness campaign was undertaken throughout the country on television, radio and the newspapers concerning occupational safety and health. Moreover, the General Occupational Safety and Health Act was published and 14 safety posters were provided to labour centres.

(d) Intense consultation has taken place systematically with respect to conciliation in order to resolve the numerous problems which have resulted from the crisis. This has had the best results at all levels, beginning with labour inspectors, the general inspectorate, the general management, the Under-Secretary for Labour, up to the Minister's office.

Article 6. First, it should be noted that the Labour Inspectorate Regulations, approved by Ministerial Resolution No. 346/87, have entered fully into force. These regulations, therefore, guarantee stability of employment for staff who serve in this operativfe unit. Proof of this is that no inspector has been removed in the last three years.

Furthermore, the total number of inspectors has increased from 63 in 1991 to 73 in 1992, of which six belong to the Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Inspection Service. Of this total, ten inspectors have recently been created in the following districts:

1. Monteagudo	Departmen of Chuquisaca
2. Mineros	Department of Santa Cruz
3. Montero	Department of Santa Cruz
4. Ibirgazama	Department of Cochabamba
5. Colagaita	Department of Potosí
6. Bermejo	Department of Tarija
7. Positos	Department of Tarija
8. Villamontes	Department of Tarija
9. Sorata	Department of La Paz
10. Itinerant Inspector	Tupiza, Potosí

Articles 10, 11, 16, 20 and 21. The wages of the inspection staff in each administrative section were also increased, according to the economic possibilities of the National General Treasury, in the following amount and percentage:

from Bs. 131-210	60.31 per cent
1991 from January to July
from Bs. 210-235	11.90 per cent
from August to December
from Bs. 235-242	2.98 per cent
from Bs. 242-263	8.68 per cent

Presently, the working conditions are unsurpassable with respect to physical space, equipment, lighting, cleanliness and other aspects, as compared with conditions three years ago.

Article 16. This article is fully applied since inspectors carry out their visits under the same terms as the Convention and as often as necessary.

With respect to the annual reports referred to in Articles 20 and 21, their publication and distribution will take place in the next months due to the new mechanisms which are being organised in the Ministry.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour, stated that contrary to what was indicated by the Committee of Experts, regulations on labour inspection were in force in his country since 1987. In the last three years, the administrative problems encountered in the area of labour administration had been overcome with a contribution from a national seminar organised with the technical assistance of the ILO on the training of labour inspectors (1991). There was progress made in ensuring the professional status and continuity of the labour inspectors (the Government will be asking for ILO technical assistance on this point). With regard to the areas covered by inspection, new districts had been created covering not only capital cities but also agricultural areas (these did not exist before due to the absence of enterprises and the obsolete methods of production in these areas). In the major districts the number of inspectors grew by 50 per cent as compared to the figures in 1990 and between 1990 and 1992. The salaries of the inspectors increased by 100 per cent and they now have permanent status in their jobs.

The Workers' members stressed the importance that was attached by the Committee to labour inspection, because without an adequate labour inspection service many legislative provisions could not be implemented. An adequate labour inspection service that was reasonably well paid, well trained and provided stable employment was essential. They noted with interest that the number of inspectors had increased, and that in ten districts wages had been increased substantially. In reference to the information requested in the Committee of Experts' report, they stated that they had failed to fully understand the responses given. In particular, they referred to Articles 5, 6, 10, 20 and 21. They asked the Government member to reply to the point raised by the Committee in respect of Article 5, regarding the importance of the collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers of their organisations. In their view, great importance should be attached to the question of stability of empoyment and independence of inspectors (Article 6). They noted, however, that the Government's report contradicted information given at the 1990 Conference regarding certain regulations; the Workers' members wished to know whether or not these regualtions had actually entered into force. They also requested information about a further point raised in the Committee of Experts' report concerning publication of annual inspection reports. They emphasised that it was not useful for inspectors to make inspections without producing reports the might be seen by everyone, and then the goverment providing periodic published reports to the ILO, which could ensure that this work was being carried out in a satisfactory manner.

The Employers' members maintained that the Government representative seemed to be aware of the significance of inspection, and that the Government had already accomplished much in this area and was prepared to make further efforts. However, they noted that no precise answers were given to specific issues dealt with in the Committee of Experts' report. Interest was expressed in clarification of several matters raised in the Committee of Experts' report. Firstly, they wished to have information about coordination between the different supervisory or inspection bodies, in relation to Article 5. Secondly, they wished to know whether the labour inspectorate regulations that for administrative reasons had not been implemented were now in force. Thirdly, they raised the matter of the publication of inspection reports, which were necessary for an overall view by the ILO and the Government of the situation. In order for the Govenment to take measures, it had to have complete data and facts; inspection reports were a excellent basis for such information. In addition, they asked for information on the application of Convention No. 129, and a reaction to the comment in the Experts' report that the Government thought that it was neither appropriate nor practical in the agricultural sector to organise labour inspection. They emphasised that the Government had ratified Convention No. 129 in 1977 and should be able to take relevant measures for its application.

The Government representative reiterated that his Government intended to take into account the comments of the ILO in order to improve its activities and to apply the Conventions. He emphasised that it was more important to observe that a country had taken necessary measures in order to ensure the application of the Conventions themselves. The principle of coordination of inspection sevices with other government services, and inspection officials with employers and workers and their organisation, as provided for in Article 5 of Convention No. 81, was fully respected not only because the Convention required it but also because it was indispensable in practice. In reference to Article 6 of the same Convention on stability in employment of inspection staff, he indicated that the regulations previously referred to guaranteed such stability and that for the past three years no inspector had been dismissed, except on the basis of performance. In respect of Article 10 concerning the number of inspectors, he indicated that this number had doubled since 1990. He also referred to the Article concerning the means which it was necessary to provide to inspectors for the carrying out of their duties, and stated that in 1990 inspectors were working under minimal conditions. Since that time, the physical space in which they worked had been quadrupled, and remuneration and expenses had been increased, as the Government wanted inspectors to be able to fulfil their tasks, thus guaranteeing respect for the rights of workers. His Government had a special interest in the application of these principles, as it was aware that inspection was the instrument that permitted it to ensure respect for the Conventions. In respect of the annual report on inspection services referred to in Article 21, he pointed out the difficulties which had been encountered in publishing this report, and requested the assistance of the ILO for the purpose of improving this situation. In response to the question regarding the Inspectorate Regulations, he stated that it was in force.

The Workers' members stated that it was still not clear to them whether the Government's report was intended to include the application of Convention No. 129. Some signs of progress had been noted concerning sugar-cane and cotton harvest workers, but agriculture as a whole still did not appear to be included, according to the Experts' report.

The Government representative, in referring to Convention No. 129, stated that in the past labour legislation had excluded the country's agricultural sector. This sector was incorporated within the scope of the application of the General Labour Code pursuant to Decree No. 20255. This created the necessity for inspection in the agricultural sector, and in this sense the demand of the ILO coincided with the decision of the Government, two years ago, to establish inspection in the agricultural sector. He stated that of the ten inspectorates established, eight were in the agricultural sector. Moreover, given the particular situation of this sector and in order to permit a better understanding of social legislation, a plan for diffusion by means of posters had been put into practice, which would permit a better understanding of such laws.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative on the points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts. The Committee was under the impression that progress had been made, but requested the Government, in view of the fact that two different Conventions were involved, to send in the near future a detailed report to the ILO concerning the questions raised.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (ratification : 1971). The Government has supplied the following information :

Referring to Article 20 of the Convention, the Government emphasised the changes in the powers of the secretariat of the Popular Committee for Vocational Training. In 1989 this Secretariat had been entrusted with the supervision of foreign manpower and its employment. In 1990 the powers of the Secretariat were extended to cover national manpower and the Committee has given special attention to labour inspection. The Committee's Secretariat appoints labour inspectors in each of the seven municipalities of the country and gives them the status and competence of members of the judicial police. As a result, the training and manpower offices in the municipalities have been reorganised. At the beginning of 1991, the Government organised a general inspection drive in which 30 employment inspectors participated in six working groups. Two hundred and fifty-four places of work were inspected in the different regions.

During such visits the inspectors informed employers and workers on occupational safety and health. Violations were noted and many cases were brought before the courts. The inspection machinery is currently undergoing reorganisation and new inspectors will be named after a period of training.

In addition, a Government representative indicated that the observation of the Committee of Experts was based on a labour inspection report for 1987 and 1988, by the Department of Labour in Tripoli. He reiterated written information provided to the Conference Committee and referred to the programme of inspection for 1991, giving the number of inspections carried out and violations recorded.

The Employers' members believed that a small step forward had been made inasmuch as the Government had just submitted its first annual report under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention which was ratified 21 years ago. It would be for the Experts to decide initially if the report was complete. In any event, it was appropriate to expect that such reports would be submitted regularly in future, so that the Government would be in compliance with the obligations arising from the Convention.

The Workers' members did not entirely share the optimism of the Employers' members. In the previous year when the identical case had been discussed, the Government had undertaken to submit without delay a report on the Convention, and the same thing had occured in 1988. Up to the present time these undertakings had not been honoured. In the case of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, it was not possible to accept arguments of an economic or administrative nature. It was regrettable to note that this country was one those which usually submitted its reports after the Committee of Experts had finished its work and before the Conference began. It would be desirable to adopt firm conclusions, and to emphasise that the Government should change its attitude respecting the obligations arising from the Convention.

The Government representative stated that the delay in submitting the reports could be explained by the difficulties in the procedures necessary for their compilation but were also due to the sanctions imposed on his country. Similarly it would be desirable to have received the observations of the Committee of Experts in Arabic without the delays which had occured in that year.

The Committee noted the information submitted by the Government. It also noted that the Government had in the meantime submitted a detailed report to the ILO. It regretted that the report had not been sent within the prescribed time-limit and that it had thus not been in a position to discuss the contents of the said report during the present meeting. The Committee hoped to be in a position to do this at one of its next meetings.

Paraguay (ratification: 1967). A Government representative, the Vice-Minister of Labour, referred to the comment made by the Committee of Experts concerning Article 13 of the Convention and the powers of labour inspectors. In practice, the following procedure was applied: at the request of an interested party or officer the Division of Occupational Safety and Health undertook a first inspection and, if the safety and health conditions were not adequate, the employer would be granted a reasonable period of time to remedy the situation. After this, a second inspection was carried out and if the situation was still unsatisfactory, sanctions would be imposed by means of an administrative resolution. Under the Health Code, which is enforced by the Ministry of Public Health and Welfare, in cases of immediate danger the operational licence of an establishment may be withdrawn. Furthermore a national tripartite Occupational Safety and Health Board had been created by Decree No. 10.836 of 6 September 1991. In conformity with Section 280(b) of the Labour Code presently in force, a general technical manual containing standards concerning conditions in the workplace was provided to employers' and workers' organisations for consideration. This manual would soon be mandatory in the entire country and a copy would be transmitted to the ILO shortly. Furthermore, the Government had quintupled the budget of the Occupational Safety and Health Department as compared with last year. The Government was presently reviewing the possibility of technical and financial assistance from the ILO in order to evaluate the national situation with respect to working conditions and occupational safety and health. The Government representative admitted, as was pointed out in the Committee of Experts' comments, that the information provided by the Government was insufficient and stated that the necessary measures were being taken to overcome this difficulty by providing different workshops under the auspices of the ILO and through the horizontal cooperation which had begun with the ILO Office in Buenos Aires. With respect to Articles 10, 16, 20 and 21 of the Convention, while the number of inspectors was insufficient, the Minister intended to present in 1993 a new request to the Treasury for a substantial increase in the number of inspectors and an improvement in the conditions necessary for their effective functioning. Finally, he added that Decree No. 43, which established an increase in the fines applicable for non-compliance with labour provisions, was passed by Executive Order on 31 March 1992.

The Employers' members welcomed the information provided by the Government representative which led one to believe that the legislation would soon be in line with the Convention, but noted that action was also necessary to ensure compliance in practice. They noted the Government's indication that the resources necessary for inspection would be increased, but wondered whether the resources obtained would actually be sufficient and therefore urged the Government to make its best efforts to ensure that this would be the case. They further noted that additional powers would be given to labour inspectors and that a reasonable amount of time would be provided to employers to resolve problems before drastic sanctions would be imposed. They requested the Government to indicate how long a period of time would be given to employers to enable them to take the necessary action before sanctions would be applied. They noted the Government's indication of its intention to communicate the number of inspection visits carried out, but recalled that, under the Convention, an annual inspection report was to be published in order to permit a review of the national situation, the type of remedies used and to assess their effectiveness. Nevertheless, they were encouraged by the Government's statement and noted that the information provided in the next years would demonstrate whether the measures taken were sufficient.

The Workers' members recalled that there were two main problems with respect to the application to this Convention: (1) insufficient powers for labour inspectors, and (2) incomplete information provided in the inspection reports. They noted the Government's assurances that measures would be taken to improve the situation but stressed, as had been noted by the Employers' members, the importance of the practical application of the Convention. They urged the Government to communicate, as soon as possible, further information on the measures taken to improve the situation concerning the above two points for examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative stated that the normal practice for labour inspection visits was to first carry out an initial visit, noting the irregularity, and then granting the employer a period of time to overcome the difficulties. Once this period had elapsed, a second visit was undertaken to verify the situation and, if the anomalies had not been corrected, an adminsitrative resolution would impose the fine established by law. He further noted that new standards existed with respect to non-compliance with labour law in areas other than those of occupational safety and health, and recalled once again the existence of Decree No. 43. Finally, he noted that the results of this Decree were encouraging and promised to inform the Office of the effects of its implementation.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government. It stressed the importance of the Labour Inspectorate and the annual publication of its reports, in conformity with the Convention. It therefore expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary steps to ensure the application of the Convention in the near future.

Spain (ratification: 1960). A Government representative pointed out that the observation of the Committee of Experts was based on the comments made by two Spanish unions but that the corresponding Government report had been handed in to them in compliance with the standards of tripartism figuring in the ILO Constitution and Convention No. 144. The necessity of increasing the actual staff available to the Labour Inspectorate – in relation to Articles 1, 3 (paragraph 1) and 16 of the Convention – was one of the aspects upon which the present team in the Labour Inspectorate had concentrated attention upon: the simplification procedures; full distribution of information with respect to what were the essential characteristics of the work accomplished by inspection; conclusion in October 1991 of an agreement with the Savings Bank Organisation to provide long-term and low-interset credit in order to facilitate the preparation of examination procedures to enable staff to join the Labour Inspectorate. According to statistics put at the Committee's disposal, these measures permitted in 1992 to hold examinations for 75 new posts in the senior grade of labour inspectors and social security and for 40 new posts in the grade of labour controllers. There was also a corresponding increase of material resources and of ancillary staff necessary to fulfil the objectives of labour inspection. With regard to "workplaces which were not inspected to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions" (Article 16 of the Convention), it was appropriate to point out the provisions of section 12 of Act No. 39 of 21 July 1962 on the Organisation of Labour Inspection and of section 10 of Decree No. 2122 of 23 July 1971 which approved the regulation of labour inspection establishing the determining circumstances for the priority and frequency of visits to the workplace. There were also statistics on the number and nature of the activities undertaken by the Labour Inspectorate as well as on the steep increase in the number of workplaces inspected and the total number of activities carried out (more than 12 per cent in 1991 in comparison with 1990). With regard to the actual cooperation between employers' and workers' representatives and those of the Labour Inspectorate, the Circular of September 1988 issued by the General Inspectorate of Labour should be referred to. It provided that the inspector had to collect information as per section 30.2 of Act No. 32 of 1962 and of section 22(i) of Decree No. 2122 of 1971. It also provided that during inspection visits representatives of workers and of the company should be present and that meetings should be convened with such persons when the circumstances required. Cooperation with the Labour Inspectorate was going to be reinforced by a draft regulation of a procedure for penalties which was provided by Act No. 8 of 7 April 1988 on violations and penalties with regard to welfare matters particularly when the procedures of the Labour Inspectorate were related to the rights of representation, the protection of freedom of association or the compliance with labour standards on occupational safety and health. Moreover, workers' representatives received copies of the reports of the Labour Inspectorate. Since January 1991 cooperation between the Labour Inspectorate and employers' and workers' representatives were required on the matter of recruitment of workers and this cooperation between the Labour Inspectorate and employers' and workers' representatives were required on the matter of recruitment of workers and this cooperation had to be extended to prevent work hazards under section 39 of a draft Bill a copy of which had also been transmitted to this Committee. As for the measures adopted by the Labour Inspectorate to ensure the implementation of the clauses of collective agreements, information on this matter had been transmitted in the Government's reports on the implementation of the Convention. Certain judicial decisions confirmed the competence of labour inspectors to implement the normative clauses of collective agreements. Generally speaking, the Labour Inspectorate had fixed its activities towards specific objectives and had planned its work in order to reinforce control over companies. As to the point made by the Committee of Experts in its observation on labour controllers, it would be appropriate to supplement the information communicated in the Government's report on the implementation of the Convention by adding that section 27 of Act No. 31 on Budgetary Resources for 1992 had amended section 52 of Act No. 8 of 1988. It contained a new paragraph which provided for the presumption of veracity with regard to the statements of violations made by labour controllers when they concerned facts which had been duly proved. Thus the problem which had arisen due to certain legal decisions which had contested the validity of the procedures carried out by labour controllers had been resolved.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the fairly detailed information supplied in response to the requests of the Committe of Experts, whose observation reflected the comments made by the workers' organisations concerning insufficient means available to the labour inspection and the lack of collaboration with the workers' organisations. The decrease of financial means made available to the labour inspection seemed to be related to the budgetary restraints inspired by the necessity, strongly felt in Spain, of aligning the European economic policies. It however might have negative social consequences. When the inspection was supplied with excessively limited means, the practical application of labour standards was less controlled, to the detriment of workers and also of employers who respected these standards, as the visits on the spot of enterprises constituted the most effective form of supervision. The cooperation between the labour inspection and the workers' organisations should be developed. In spite of the declaration of the Government representative, there seemed to be problems in this regard. As the Commitee of Experts indicated in paragraph 57 of its general report and also emphasised in this Committee, such cooperation, not costly for the State, was likely to improve the application of the Convention. It was therefore important to request the Government to respond as precisely as possible to the requests of the Committee of Experts, which should be easier since the statement of the Government representative already included a certain number of elements which should be found in its next report.

The Employers' members also thanked the Government representative for the detailed reply. In a large measure, the observation of the Committee of Experts summarised the criticisms made by the workers' organisations concerning the structure and function of the labour inspection, said to be under-equipped and provided with insufficiently qualified personnel. It was for example indicated that the labour inspectors would not be able to determine whether the clauses of collective agreement were of a "normative" or "obligational" nature. It concerned a problem on which it was difficult for the present Committee to pronounce itself, and neither did the Committee of Experts take a position in this regard. The Committee of Experts limited itself to enumerate the problems on which detailed reply of the Government was requested. The Government representative had supplied a full reply. Nevertheless, it concerned a type of case where a written reply was necessary. It would not be possible to make a fundamental appreciation on the basis of a simple oral statement. Only a written report submitted for the examination by the Committee of Experts according to the normal procedure would permit it to determine which problems had been resolved and which remained. For the moment, it might be questioned whether it was useful to treat in the Conference Committee cases for which the Committee of Experts had not been in a position to formulate its opinion.

The Workers' member of Spain emphasised that in this case it was not the activity of labour inspectors which had to be questioned but the Government's attitude to the labour inspectorate. Labour inspectors worked very well and it would only be necessary to give them more resources. In addition, they were too few in numbers, which hampered the effective implementation of the Convention. If Convention No. 81 was not fully applied, all international labour Conventions risked remaining a dead letter. The application of the Convention should be examined under three headings: hiring; control of complaince with collective agreements; and activities of labour inspection as regards health and safety at work. As regards the hiring of workers, a distinction was made in Spanish labour inspection between "inspectors" and "controllers". The latter dealt exclusively with work centres employing fewer than 25 workers and only for subsidised contracts. Taking into account the multiplication of the types of precarious contracts, in practice it was the majority of work centres with fewer than 25 workers, where such contracts were the most frequent, which were not inspected, by inspectors or controllers. Because of the high levels of unemployment in Spain, i.e. about 15 per cent of the working population, the labour inspectorate had to intervene in order to prevent employers from unduly resorting to temporary contracts. Rather than raising the resources of labour inspction, the Government chose instead to reduce unemployment benefits by 40 per cent, which led to the half-day strike on 28 May 1992. Spanish labour law doctrine distinguished between "normative" provisions in collective agreements and those which are "obligatory". According to this doctrine, the labour inspectorate should abstain from controlling the application of obligatory clauses. Therefore, the labour inspectorate ceased filling its conciliatory functions, which led to an increase in the number of strikes and to a situation where Recommendation No. 92 of 1951 on voluntary concliation and arbitration was not complied with. The Government also presented a draft law restricting the right to strike rather than promoting with the same dispatch a new legislation on health at work. The multiplication of visits by the labour inspectorate was an essential means to prevent violations and accidents in the field of health and safety at work, but of course the Government seemed to be mainly preoccupied by is economic commitments under the Maastricht Treaty signed on 7 February 1992, even though that would mean limiting the resources of labour inspection. Two issues remained : the exact distribution of work between labour inspectors and controllers, and measures which would be taken to ensure that the labour inspectorate may control the implementation the collective agreements.

A Workers' member of Greece emphasised the importance of the implementation of this Convention. The Government's attitude was well known: for reasons of image, they voted for the adoption of Conventions, then they enacted legislation which was compatible with these Conventions. However, the situation was different when these acts had to be applied. The European trade unions heard quite often the excuse of insufficient financial means; it was reflected today by the pretext of economic convergence provided for by the Maastricht Treaty of 7 February 1992. And yet, it would be preferable to combat tax evasion rather than asking sacrifices from workers, in order to put public finances in order. Countries had nothing to benefit from neglecting their labour inspection services since it was well known that violation of labour laws had a cost for the community as a whole.

The Government representative stated that he had taken due note of the discussion. As regards the intervention of Workers' members, it should be noted that there were no links between the project on European economic convergence and the labour inspection budget, which indeed had been raised, as was the number of inspectors. All the data available showed that visits by labour inspectors increased both in number and in quality, which helped improve collaboration between employers' and workers' representatives. Concerning the Employers' members intervention, a written reply to the issues raised by the Committee of Experts' observation was more appropriate. The statement of the Workers' member of Spain went beyond the questions relating to the application of the Convention. There could always be a feeling of insufficiency, even if in reality personnel and material resources for labour inspection had been increased. The points made on the recruitement of workers were more related to employment policy, and those made on the nature of clauses in collective agreements involved an academic debate which had no bearing on the practical activities of labour inspection. One could not but share the opinion expressed on the vital role played by inspectors' visits to workplaces. In reply to the questions raised, it had to be pointed out that, in general terms, the procedures followed by labour inspectors and controllers were the same and their validity was recognised for both categories of officials. Except for one observation raised in certain judicial decisions, labour inspection could fully monitor the application of the contents of collective bargaining agreement and a circular had been adopted on this subject. If the solidarity expressed by the Workers' member of Greece was well understood, he shared that speaker's opinion that labour inspection did not have adequate resources. Each year the ILO received a copy of the annual report of the central labour inspection authority in conformity with the Convention, and the comments made did not concern questions of substance relating to labour inspection activities.

The Workers' member of Spain recalled the distribution of tasks between labour inspectors and labour controllers and stated that while this was not clearly laid out by law, it was the subject of internal labour inspection circulars.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative according to which the Government had taken measures to improve the position of the labour inspectorate with a view to increasing its resources and strengthening its powers. Although it welcomed the detailed information which had been supplied, it considered that it was not in a position to discuss it in substance without an assessment by the Committee of Experts. It consequently hoped that the Government would transmit, as it had said it was ready to do, a report to the ILO containing all the particulars necessary for the Committee of Experts to weigh that information and make a full assessment of the situation. It hoped that it would be able to come to the conclusion that the situation was in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention at one of its next sessions.

Syrian Arab Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative requested an extension of the deadline for supplying the Governments's inspection reports. In order to obtain the statistics and information needed under the Convention, it was necessary to contact various government bodies such as the Directorate of Social and Labour Atafairs. Moreover, this information concerning the different districts had to be authenticated by the Central Statistical Office. He indicated that it was necessary for the Government to enter into consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations to improve labour inspection. Finally, he noted that he had supplied a first inspection report to the ILO, and he hoped that this would satisfy the Committee.

The Employers' members stated that they could not comment on the substance of the matter because the Experts' report noted only that inspection reports had not been supplied for several years. They were aware that preparation and publication of these reports required time. Nevertheless, they emphasised that the obligation under the Convention was to publish and supply such reports to the ILO on an annual basis. The Employers' members noted that the Government had supplied inspection reports immediately prior to the Conference, which amounted to a first step, and hoped that such reports would be supplied regularly in the future.

The Workers' members joined in the comments and the request of the Employers' members.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government. It recalled its repeatedly expressed views on the importance of the yearly reports on labour inspection. It sincerely hoped that the Government would comply with the requirements of the Convention in that respect.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Colombia (ratification : 1976). The Government communicated the following information :

The political Constitution prohibits the suspension and cancellation of the legal personality of trade union organisations, and it is appropriate to note that such a provision is also found in Act No. 50 of 1990.

However, the requirement that two-thirds of the members be Colombian in order to form a trade union, the alleged intervention in the internal administration of trade unions owing to the presence of public servants of the ministry at some meetings (particularly when they declare a strike), the requirement of Colombian nationality to be elected a trade union leader, the additional penalty of denying trade union office for a period up to three years where a judge has found a person responsible for the dissolution of a trade union, and the requirement that persons be of the respective occupation or profession in order to be elected as a trade union officer are matters which were fully referred to in the letter dated 25 October 1991 directed to the Director-General of the ILO (the Government has attached a copy of its letter).

The Government had requested in a letter dated 9 October 1991 sent to the Director-General of the ILO that – considering the importance of the matter – a Convention be adopted on the right to strike. The Government regrets that the Director-General wrote on 22 November 1991 that, for procedural reasons, he would not be able to include this significant matter on the agenda of the International Labour Conference in 1992 or 1993. The Government takes this opportunity to reiterate its request concerning the urgency of the adoption by the ILO of a Convention expressly concerning the right to strike. It is equally insisting on the fact that this right should not be derived from interpretations which, even if they are valid, are but the opinions of respectable jurists. In this sense it mentions that there are restrictions on the right to strike taking into account that the Labour Minister and the President of the Republic can invoke the arbitration tribunal to resolve the conflicts after 60 days of strike or if the strike affects the whole of the national economy.

In this respect, it is very illustrative to mention the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Justice which has considered Law No. 50 of 1990 to be in conformity with the Constitution and has expressed itself on the above-mentioned question in the following manner :

The trade union movement, particularly in moments of its apogee, had always wanted the right to strike to be absolute and unlimited so that collective disputes could only be resolved by its unconditional will ; nevertheless, it was recognised that strikes prejudice not only the interests of workers who rely on them to fulfil their aims, but also the aims of the enterprise and, in general, those of the economic order which also deserve the same protection ; it was necessary, consequently, to seek a balance between the opposed interests and this was what was understood by those who wrote the Constitution of 1936 which did not permit strikes in the public service and left it to the law to regulate the recourse to strikes in these services as was very judiciously done in the case examined here ; the well-known image of the industrial institutions abandoned, useless, left indefinitely to deterioration and unproductivity, as permanent witnesses to the conflict which nobody wanted to resolve to recuperate lost goods and employment itself, led the law to preclude the general impoverishment and social damage made by the obstinate attitude of the parties, by means of alternative methods which do not touch the protection due to all and which now is specifically supported by article 55 of the Constitution according to which " the State has responsibility to promote ... other means for the peaceful solution of collective industrial disputes " as the arbitration court precisely does. (Supreme Court of Justice, Plenary, Decision of 26 September 1991.)

As regards the right to strike, article 56 of the Constitution provides :

The right to strike is guaranteed except in essential services as defined by legislation.

The law shall regulate the right to strike.

A standing committee composed of Government and employers' and workers' representatives shall promote good industrial relations, contribute to the resolution of collective labour disputes and coordinate wages policies and labour policies. Its composition and functioning shall be determined by law.

In performance of this constitutional requirement, the Government has, through the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, called a meeting of employers' and workers' representatives to conclude an agreement on the composition and functions of this standing committee and presented a Bill to the National Assembly on the subject in December 1991. When the law is enacted, the standing committee will, in conformity with the constitutional requirements and its purpose of coordinating labour policy, report on how legislation should be adapted to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, stated that the Committee of Experts had confirmed a major improvement in the application of the Convention, although it pointed out that provisions which could be incompatible with the Convention still existed. As regards the legislative requirements concerning nationality criticised by the Committee of Experts (two-thirds of the members had to be Colombian to establish a trade union and persons had to be Colombian for election to trade union Office), the new Constitution granted to foreigners the same rights and guarantees as nationals, but provided that the law could regulate these rights. The legislation therefore violates neither the Constitution nor the Convention. Foreigners could form unions, but could not control a union or be union leaders. This was based on national sovereignty, for example, to restrain foreign leaders from calling a strike in industries related to national security. Similar standards no doubt existed in most countries. The trade union central organisations of the country had not objected to the nationality requirements, any amendment to them could, however, be discussed when the tripartite labour commission, on which Congress was soon to pass regulations through a law, was set up. As for the supervision by public servants at meetings of unions of internal management (section 486 of the Labour Code), the presence of public servants was aimed at verifying fulfilment of the majority qualifications set out in trade union statutes, for example, for the calling of a strike. Trade unions frequently requested the presence of public servants when internal disputes occurred. In such cases, the role of the public servant was to collect evidence which would allow conflicts to be solved in the future. With regard to the suspension for up to three years of trade union officers who had been responsible for the dissolution of their unions (section 380(3) of the Code), Act No. 50 of 1990 removed the administrative power to suspend officers. It was now the judicial authority which verified whether a trade union leader was responsible for the dissolution or suspension of a union. Since such dissolution or suspension was ordered by the judicial authority, section 380(3) of the Code did not violate the Convention. With regard to the legislative requirements that persons belong to the trade or occupation in order to be a trade union leader, it was inherent in the nature of a trade union that its leaders belong to the same profession as its members. However, the Government did not insist on this point and was open to dialogue with the trade union confederations; it requested the ILO's technical assistance in this respect. As for the right to strike of federations and confederations, a draft law was before Congress on this subject and would be discussed. There had been developments in the country regarding the right to strike. The previous Constitution had recognised it, except in the public service. The new Constitution of 1991 only laid down restrictions on the right to strike in essential public services, to be defined by the legislature in a future law; there would be tripartite consultation on the subject. Moreover, the Government had requested the Governing Body of the ILO to study the possibility of a future Convention on the right to strike because at present it was the subject of conjured-up interpretations by the Committee of Experts or the Committee on Freedom of Association. The ILO should regulate the right to strike for the sake of judicial clarity. With regard to the power of the Minister of Labour and the President of the Republic to intervene in disputes (sections 448(3) and (4) and 450(1)(g) of the Code), this discretion resulted in the calling of a compulsory arbitration tribunal in conformity with the principles of the ILO supervisory bodies in cases where the right to strike was restricted. As for the possibility of dismissing trade union officers who had intevened or participated in an illegal strike (section 450(2) of the Code), the ILO supervisory bodies recognised the legitimacy of dismissal in cases of illegal strikes and the Convention provided that workers' organisations should respect the law of the land. Accordingly, this section did not violate the Convention.

The Workers' members referred to the report of the Committee of Experts which had drawn attention to the Government's report, the discussion of the Conference Committee in 1991, and the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as the 1991 direct contacts mission. They further referred to the Government's written replies and the statement by the Minister of Labour and Social Security. In describing the context in which this case was being discussed, they recalled the large number of trade unionists that had been killed or had disappeared and that the situation had not yet improved.

The Government representative made a point of order to the effect that the question of public order and disappearances and deaths concerned not only trade unionists but also politicians, peasants, soldiers, teachers, children, etc., and asked the speaker to limit himself to matters related to the Convention.

The Workers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had referred to this Committee's discussions in 1991 which had made mention of these matters. They pointed out the reason they made reference in their introductory remarks to the disappearances and deaths of trade unionists was in order to set the difficult context of freedom of association in Colombia. They noted the written information given by the Government as well as the legislative measures noted with satisfaction by the Committee of Experts in its report. They referred, however, to the points raised by the Committee of Experts that were incompatible with this Convention. With reference to the requirement that persons be Colombian for election to trade union office, they considered it was still a violation of the Convention even if membership of unions was not prohibited by such law as was pointed out by the Government representative. They welcomed, however, the statement made by the Minister that the Government would be discussing this matter with workers and further hoped that this contradiction with the Convention would be removed soon. With respect to the suspension for up to three years, with loss of trade union rights, of trade union officers who have been responsible for the dissolution of their unions, they rejected the argument that this was not done by the Government but by the labour court because in any event it was the laws of the country that permitted such suspension and those laws are not in conformity with the Convention. They pointed out, as the Employers' members had done in the context of another case, that trade unionists were not asking for immunity from ordinary laws of the country but that this Convention protected them when they acted legally as trade unionists and the law of the country was in conformity with this Convention. Regarding the requirement that persons belong to the trade or occupation in order to be considered eligible for election to trade union office, they were not sure the Government representative had said the relevant laws had been repealed, despite the fact that most trade union officials were from the trade or occupation in question, they considered the law should not prohibit unions from appointing a full-time professional officer. Referring to the Minister's statement that the prohibition of strikes in the public service being repealed except in essential public services, they pointed out possible differences between the Committee of Experts and the Government in their understanding of what constituted essential services. Even though the Convention, as had been stated, did not specifically refer to strikes, they said the Committee of Experts had made it quite clear that strikes should be allowed when workers were acting in defence of their economic and social interests, and any attempts to restrict such rights would be in contravention of the Convention. Without getting into a general debate on the right to strike, they wished to be on record as being in favour of the Committee of Experts long-standing interpretation of this Convention in this regard. They requested the Government representative to provide the Committee of Experts with a clear definition of what constituted essential public services to enable it to assess the extent of this exception. They stressed the views of the Committee of Experts that if strikes were restricted or prohibited, as in essential services, appropriate guarantee should be afforded such as impartial and speedy conciliation, mediation and arbitration procedures. With regard to the question of illegal strikes, they considered that the problem was not so much the strikes considered illegal under laws that were strictly in conformity with the Convention, but the laws that gave illegal strikes a very wide definition as did the Colombian laws and Constitution. They welcomed the information that was noted with interest by the Committee of Experts of the desire expressed by the Minister of Labour and Social Security to the direct contacts mission which took place in September 1991 to formally request the technical assistance of the ILO in the future process of reform of the labour legislation. They requested this Committee's conclusion to reflect their wish that as a result of this assistance the laws would soon be put in full conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' members felt that the report of the Committee of Experts on this question could be treated in three parts. The first part dealt with the points where national legislation was in conformity with the Convention. Two years ago the Conference Committee had considered devoting a special paragraph to Colombia. Today, however, a number of cases of progress could be observed. The second part pointed out the provision of the legislation that raised certain questions or where the Experts clearly considered these provisions to be contrary the the Convention. They acknowledged that the Government representative had provided some information relating to these points. As regards the requirement that two-thirds of the members be Colombian in order to establish a trade union, and the requirement that persons be Colombian for election to trade union office, while it was often the Labour Code that contained these requirements based on considerations of sovereignty, they noted that the Constitution of the country left the question open, as was often the case in other countries. They pointed out that, following the adoption of laws and directives of the European communities in this area, discrimination based on nationality did not exist in Europe. Given the Government's statement that it was ready to establish a dialogue with workers and employers on this subject, they considered its position to be flexible and that changes could be expected. As regards the suspension of trade union officers who were responsible for the dissolution of their unions, the Employers' members expressed doubts that these provisions would truly protect the trade union officers, and it seemed to them that it was up to the Government to examine this question and prepare amendments to the law in this respect. As regards the requirement that persons belong to the trade or occupation in order to be considered eligible for election to trade union office, they considered that this question was a subject for the union to determine internally and not a subject requiring legislative tratment. Given the statement by the Government representative that his Government was ready to engage in consultations on this subject as well, they felt that the tripartite committee he referred to earlier could be the appropriate body to take up these questions. With regard to the massive dismissals of workers in the public sector and the extended use of short-term contracts in the private sector, they felt there could be reasons other than that mentioned by the Committee of Experts, namely aimed at weakening the trade union movement, to justify such measures. However, they did not feel they should continue the discussion of this aspect at this stage. The third part of the report of the Committee of Experts related to the right to strike. The Government representative had stated that the Convention does not contain precise provisions in this respect and that the ILO should prepare an instrument on the rights and obligations relating to strikes and their restriction. The Employers' members noted that this year a draft resolution had suggested similar points but it had not been given a high priority. Therefore, in their view, it was necessary to limit the discussion to Convention No. 87 at this stage, as that instrument was the basis for the views of the Committee of Experts on this subject. Referring to earlier statements, they requested the Committee of Experts to re-examine their reasoning on the right to strike, as the results of such reasoning do not follow from the text of the Convention. They considered that the Convention should, as the Committee of Experts itself had indicated on other occasions, be strictly interpreted according to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, in particular articles 31 and 32 which, besides the context, require the taking into account of (a) all prior agreement regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions made between the parties and (b) all prior practice followed in the application of the treaty, using which the agreement between the parties for the interpretation of the treaty was established. The report of the Committee of Experts contained a large number of points on the application of the Convention throughout the world. It was clear from this report that the situation in various countries was so different that there were no common elements to be identified in the application or prohibition of the right to strike. Using the interpretation rules of the Vienna Convention it was clear that the rules supplied by the Committee of Experts for the interpretation of this Convention were clearly incorrect. Indeed, strikes not only adversedly affected employers, but third parties as well. The definition of the scope and the prohibition of strikes should not, as a result, be left to the decision of one party; only the State that had fully accepted the democratic rights and liberties of its citizens, should be responsible for the definition of the right to strike and its limitations. The Employers' members considered that this question, along with the others previously mentioned, justified that this question, along with the others previously mentioned, justified that a request be made to the Committee of Experts for it to once again re-examine its conclusions. The fact that the same conclusions had been reached concerning the Committee on Freedom of Association for many years did not make either these conclusions nor the principles derived from Convention No. 87 correct. Finally, as regards the right to strike in Colombia, the Employers' members disagreed with the conclusions reached by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Colombia indicated that, during the month of June 1992, nine trade unionists were assassinated and, contrary to the statement made by the Minister of Labour, the situation of unions in Colombia is very grave in law (as indicated by the Workers' members last year referring in particular to Law No. 50 of 1990) as well as in practice. The Government interfered in union activity because of the legal obligation imposed on unions to invite officials of the Ministry of Labour to attend their general assemblies. These officials went to the extent of asking all workers to present their identity papers when a vote was being taken to call a strike. In these circumstances the trade unionists felt obliged to meet secretly at night to avoid reprisals. Even if the new legislation gave automatically legal personality to unions the Ministry has continued to give its approval in a discretionary manner. The extended use of short-term contracts (between 15 days and 3 months) constituted a serious impediment to freedom of association because the workers involved recognised that their contract would not be renewed if they became members of a union. The great majority of strikes were declared illegal including those that took place in services that were clearly not essential. That was the case during the strike at the Hotel Teguendama following the dismissal of 24 workers when agreement could not be reached in the context of the proceedings signed to settle the labour dispute. Recently, trade union leaders were criminally tried for sabotage and their case given to "anonymous" judges having jurisdiction over cases of terrorism, for having called a strike in a telecommunications organisation. In addition, 27 workers were threatened with dismissal and the president of the organisation concerned as well as the Minister of Labour requested the withdrawal of the legal personality of the union and the suspension for up to three years of the trade union officers. In the oil sector a union was fined millions following a strike. In many instances strikes were called to ask for the right to life of union leaders. Finally, in view of the many grave violations of freedom of association in the country the speaker requested that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph of the report.

Another Workers' member of Colombia stated that the right to form unions did not exist in Colombia in law and in practice because of the elements he would enumerate which were direct and indirect threats to freedom of association. Employment contracts were given in the form of civil or commercial contracts; contracts of very short periods, which actually numbered 1,050,000, were permitted; the right to appeal decisions concerning requests for re-employment of workers with ten years of service but who were dismissed without reason; a grace period of ten years was given to enterprises during which they did not apply the same bargaining unit to all their subsidiaries, thus weakening the results of collective bargaining which would have been beneficial to trade unions; temporary work was facilitated and the establishment of organisations providing such services was promoted which hindered unionisation; collective agreements were concluded with non-unionised workers; Law No. 60 and its implementing decrees created systems of dismissal and mass retirements based on blackmail promoting retirements with negligible compensation for employees of the State (400,000 such retirements and dismissals are expected in the coming two years): all public services, including land irrigation, the production of cement, the financial and petroleum sectors, were declared essential services with a view to making all strikes illegal; recently employers were permitted to make complaints under criminal law in the case of strikes in order to hinder the enjoyment of the right to work; penalties equivalent to minimum wages of 80 months were imposed on the petroleum workers' union for having organised two to three hours of work stoppage; strikes were considered crimes of terrorism and were submitted to "anonymous" judges during which procedures access to files was not permitted. Given the fact that laws and the practice in the country were not in conformity with the Convention and no progress has been observed and 102 trade union members and leaders were assassinated in the past year, the speaker requested that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph and that the ILO should provide technical assistance in the drafting of future labour legislation.

A Workers' member from Spain stated that the improvements in the laws mentioned by the Committee of Experts should be assessed in the context of the low level of respect given to union rights in the country. The speaker felt that provisions in the law regarding the supervision of the internal management of unions including the presence of public servants in the general assemblies were unacceptable because they indicated the prevailing lack of confidence in unions and the fact they were objects of suspicion unlike other organisations. He stated that unions were not anomalies in society but were necessary elements for progress in the country as indicated by the past 40 years of tripartism in Europe. In addition, he found the prohibition of strikes by federations and confrontations was unacceptable because the Convention gave the same rights to these organisations as it did to trade unions in general and constituted an essential part of freedom of association. Referring to the statements of the Minister of Labour on the interpretation of the right to strike made by the Committee of Experts he rejected the view that these interpretations were conjured up by them and said on the contrary that the Experts were as indispensable as judges and lawyers were to giving meaning to constitutional rights. Finally, he stated that a government that did not guarantee the right to life was not worthy of the name. He pointed out that in Colombia, as previous speakers indicated, trade unionists were assassinated and tortured constituting grave ciolations of the Convention. A Workers' member of Greece denied that trade union rights of foreigners were restricted in all countries for reasons of threats to the security of these countries and sighted the cases of Belgium and Germany where immigrant workers were part of the trade union leadership. The question of internal security in the context of a strike arose only with respect to certain particular sectors. He urged that the legislation be put in conformity with the Convention and that the Government should indicate its intentions in this regard and request the technical assistance of the ILO.

A Workers' member of France stated that the interventions previously made by the Colombian trade unionists demonstrated, if it was still necessary to do so, the extent of the difficulties with which the trade union movement was presently confronted in Colombia. He noted the limitations on trade unionism in this country: the problem of foreign workers, raised by the Workers' member of Greece; that of part-time workers, the number of which was constantly increasing; and the interference of political power in the trade union movement, notably through the presence of authorities in general meetings held to take strike votes. In respect of the request of the Employers' spokesman that the ILO adopt a Convention concerning the right to strike, he stated that this was not the ideal time to discuss the report and the views of the Committee of Experts concerning the scope of freedom of association. The right to freely organise their activities and to formulate their programme of action, provided for in Article 3 of the Convention, was a prerogative of trade union organisations, and for this reason since 1919 one had refrained from curbing or limiting its application by means of a Convention. The strict framing of the right to strike must be avoided and the provisions of the Convention respected. The Workers' member of France emphasised that the best way to assist the Government to develop legislation was to formulate firm requirements in the conclusions of this debate.

A Government member of Germany refered to the comments of the Committee of Experts on this case, and the written statement made by the Government and said that there were no means to verify many of the events described, and, although these matters were quite shocking, they did not constitute the matters upon which it was necessary for the Committee to pass judgement. He noted that considerable progress had been made, although there remained significant discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. However, he emphasised that this view did not apply to everything that had been said, nor to all the findings of the Committee of Experts concerning restrictions placed on the right to strike in the public service.

Another Workers' member of Colombia stated that in his country there was neither justice, democracy or free trade unionism, and that he was required to speak before the Committee, because to remain silent would be to betray the confidence of those who had sent him to the Committee to defend their rights. In his country, there existed a so-called anonymous justice, which permitted the judging of someone without his knowing who was judging, who was accusing or of what one was accused. A number of trade union leaders of the national telecommunications company who has engged in a strike when it wanted to privatise the enterprise, were being judged today by anonymous judges. This year, at the time of the 500th anniversary of the discovery of America, indigenous persons had been murdered because they were looking for a bit of land where they could work, land which always had belonged to them. He considered that the Government of Colombia deserved to have the case of this country included in a special paragraph.

A Workers' member of Uruguay referred to the consequences of the policy of indiscriminate rationalisation and privatisation of public enterprises. He stated that the right to strike was an inalienable right, the tool which workers had in order to defend themselves, and for this reason restrictions on this right meant that there would be a reduction of its most important means of defence. With reference to that which had been stated by the Government representative to the effect that it would be appropriate to adopt an international labour standard on the right to strike, he asked whether what the Government representative wanted was to impose restrictions, and indicated that the Committee on Freedom of Association has stated that limitations on the right to strike could only be justified in cases in which strikes ceased to be peaceful. He recalled that in Colombia trade union leaders had been murdered, strikes were prohibited, there was no freedom of association, and Convention No. 87 was being contravened; he therefore asked the Committee to include the case of Colombia in a special paragraph.

The Government representative stated that his country guaranteed freedom of association to foreigners, but it was another matter to permit a group of foreigners to be able to dominate a trade union and to declare a strike. Regarding the clear constitutional definition in respect of the right to strike, he indicated that the Constitution guaranteed this right except when essential services were involved, but that such services still had not been determined; this was a task for Congress. He considered that the situation regarding the right to strike was different according to the country in question, and according to its development. The reference which he had made to the possibility of adopting an instrument of this nature did not mean that his Government wished to limit the right to strike. This right had been found to be limited, even by the Committee of Experts; for the Committee, the freedom of association which had been established did not allow strikes in essential public services, or in the public administration. The purpose of his proposal that an international instrument be adopted on the right to strike was to set out the limits for this right. In reference to the intervention of the Workers' member of Spain to the effect that his Government did not respect the right to life, he emphasised that his Government did respect the right to life, not only as required in international instruments on human rights, but also under the national Constitution, and on behalf of his Government he fervently rejected this allegation. He referred to the difficult situation in his country, an excellent place for drug traffickers, but rejected the insinuation to the effect that the murder of a number of indigenous persons was owing to inaction on the part of the Government. His Government was struggling against such circumstances, and it seemed that other governments, for example Spain and the United Kingdom, were experiencing similar circumstances in respect of terrorist activities, without one being able to suggest that they did not respect the right to life.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that the Government nad not responded to the question which had been raised in respect of the situation of the trade union movment, and reiterated his question as to what were the essential public services in Colombia, as the absence of definition in the legislation left the determination of such services to the free will of the Government.

A Workers' member of Ecuador stated that he shared the different opinions expressed in the Committee on the report of the Committee of Experts, which had recognised that Colombia had made some progress in implementing legislation. Nevertheless, he observed that in their interventions the Workers' members had stressed the discrepancy between such provisions and practice. He referred to the intervention of public servants at trade union meetings, which according to the Government representative was intended to guarantee the democracy of the decisions which trade unions were adopting. In his opinion, this involved a clear violation of the Convention. He considered that the Government had an interest in eliminating such participation in trade union meetings, and that such participation might lead to suspicion in the cases of murders of trade union leaders, in that there could be established a cause and effect relationship between these matters. The speaker observed that presently the rights of workers guaranteed under ILO Conventions appeared to be becoming fewer. In this context, he clarified that trade union freedom which was not accompanied by the right to strike as an indispensable complement was a non-existent freedom of association.

A Workers' member of Chile stated that Chilean trade unionists had extensive experience in respect of restrictive laws on the trade union movement. After having heard Colombian trade unionists and those exercising public power in that country, he considered that he was confronted with a reality that was characteristic of Latin America. The restrictive laws which existed in Colombia existed in Chile and were characteristic of a dictatorship. He believed that Colombia was a country that wished to improve the institution of democracy, but which could not do so without the workers. Free workers not only exercised the right to strike but also constructed peace together with employers and politicians. He wished that the Government representative would say whether the authorities really had the will to respect the Convention. He hoped that in 1993 they would not speak more about murders, and that Government representatives would not need to give explanations. He also hoped that in the coming year the Government would show more respect for the rights of workers and human rights, so that workers could play an appropriate role in the development of their country.

A Workers' member of Greece stated that there must have been a misunderstanding, because no one had confused political power and judicial power. The latter, in all democratic countries, involved only the interpretation and the application of laws. The Government was requested to change national legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention. In addition, he asked the Government whether it intended to request technical assistance from the ILO for this purpose.

The Workers' member of Spain referred to the intervention of the Government representative. He indicated that the essential difference between what was occurring in Spain and Colombia was that in Spain, it was known who was committing the murders and acts of terrorism. The State was taking responsibility for the elimination of such murders and had succeeded in reducing their number. He requested the Government representative to respond to two questions: when was the control which the administration exercised over the trade union movement by the presence of a public servant at trade union meeting going to disappear, and when was it going to recognise the confederations and the right to hold strikes?

The Workers' members stated that the Colombian Workers members' had provided useful information in describing the types of strikes that were banned as "essential services", such as those in the hotel and oil industries. They noted that such an interpretation of "essential services" was not a correct application of the principles of the Convention. They agreed that there was a generally accepted distinction between government and judiciary in such countries: the Government established laws while the judiciary applied them, but he emphasised that if the law was wrong, the Government could not use the judiciary and its independence as an excuse for lack of action. In their view, the law was wrong and needed to be changed. The Government referred to acts of terrorism which had taken place in Spain, the United Kingdom and the USA which infringed upon the right to life. The Workers' members stated that if hundreds of trade unionists disappeared and even worse were killed every year in those countries, there could be no doubt that these facts would be of concern to this Committee and the subject of considerable discussion. There were death squads operating in Colombia that were killing trade unionists, and this fact could not be ignored. They declared that they did not believe that it would be helpful to re-open the debate on Convention No. 87 and the right to strike. They noted that a resolution in respect of this issue had been placed on the agenda of the Resolutions Committee, and had been given low priority. In their view this was an indication that both Workers' members and many governments at this Conference felt that the more detailed examination of these issues would not be helpful and certainly the work of the present Committee might become chaotic during the course of an examination which could take many years. Governments who had been strictly following interpretations of the Committee of Experts on the right to strike would begin to doubt the correctness of their application of the Convention if the principle became the subject of lengthy examination. The Committee of Experts' stated view on the issue had been clear for decades and had not been challenged except in the last year or two by the Employers' group and now the Government of Colombia.The Workers' members suggested that the Government be asked whether it could be prepared to accept technical assistance from the ILO. Although they had seen the first signs of movement towards conformity with the Convention, they stated that they wished the conclusions of the Committee to be strong enough to establish that the Government still has a considerable way to go before they were fully in conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' members stated that, despite the many problems faced by its country, the Government had managed to take positive steps in respect of the Convention, which had caused the Committee of Experts to note this case as where progress had been made. In reference to the distinction made between law and interpretation of the law, they noted that where the law was unclear or contained loopholes, the interpretation of the law became independent as it stepped in to clarify and apply the law. This was also true of Convention No 87, in respect of which a body of case law had developed which was extremely favourable to the workers' case in the present situation, although in their view the content of this case law could not be derived from the Convention. However, as the Committee of Experts had made lengthy statements about the right to strike and restrictions on this right, they must be addressed by this Committee.

The Committee took due note of the written and oral information provided by the Government. It also took note of the progress being made in conformity with the Convention, and it felt bound to recall that there still were different points raised by the Committee of Experts where the law was in conflict as the Convention. The Committee noted, however, that the Government was setting up a tripartite commission to prepare a draft Bill which the Government intended to bring before Parliament. It also took note of the Government's willingness to ask for technical assistance from the ILO. The Committee remained concerned about the situation – not only the legal one – existing in the country. It therefore urged the Government to take all necessary steps to bring the legislation into complete conformity with the Convention at its earliest convenience in order that the Committee could make a full assessment of the same at its next session.

Cuba (ratification: 1952). The Government communicated the following information:

The Committee of Experts bases its observation on criteria it established itself on trade union unity and not on the text of Convention No. 87 which recognises the right of workers to establish trade union organisations of their own choosing without specifying any criterion on trade union plurality or unity. In this connection, the Government draws the Conference Committee's attention to section 13 of the Labour Code, which states that "all workers, manual and non-manual, shall be entitled without previous authorisation to voluntarily associate and to form trade union organisations". The wordng of this important provision corresponds to Article 2 of Convention No. 87.

Furthermore, according to the Digest of Decisions and Principles of the Committee on Freedom of Association, at paragraph 223: "The Committee has pointed out that the International Labour Conference, by including the words 'organisations of their own choosing' in Convention No. 87, made allowance for the fact that, in certain countries, there are a number of different employers' and workers' organisations which an individual may choose... it did not pronounce, however, as to whether, in the interests of workers and employers, a unified trade union movement is preferable to trade union pluralism."

If the way workers exercise freedom of association finds expression in a unitary or pluralist trade union moveent, this is not a question to be reflected in legislation. It would, in fact, be a violation of Convention No. 87 to establish by legislation one or another type of trade union structure, since this Convention bases freedom of association on the choice by the workers themselves of the way in which they wish to organise their activities, their structure and programmes of action, how they wish to draw up their own constitutions and rules and elect their leaders in the manner which they consider to be most appropriate. This is what is contained in section 15 of the Labour Code.

The Committee of Experts states in paragraph 4 of its observation that the Labour Code explicity refers to the Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba. It seems that the Committee of Experts has still not had a detailed reading of section 15 of the Code. The central trade union organisation which groups together 18 national branch level unions in Cuba, according to its own rules, is named the "Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba" and is identified by the acronym CTC. Section 15 of the Labour Code, which is the text on which the Committee of Experts relies, states word for word the following: "The trade unions and the Central Organisation of Workers of which the said unions are voluntary members shall govern themselves by and act in accordance with the principles, statutes and standing orders democratically discussed and approved by their members".

As is clear from a simple reading, the reference to the Central Organisation of Workers does not identify the one called the "Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba (CTC)" according to its own statutes. In addition, the reference in section 15 to the workers' central organisation is not aimed at the setting up or maintenance of a system of trade union unity, but as an expression of full application of Article 3 of Convention No. 87.

The historical character of the trade union unity system of the workers' movement in Cuba is referred to once again.

Cuba's labour legislation does not make any reference to the structure to be adopted by trade unions, nor does it set out requirements for the exercise of trade union activity. This is a matter which is up to the workers themselves. Section 13 of the Labour Code is clear on this point. Workers have the right to form organisations of their own choosing, without previous authorisation. The second paragraph of this section stipulates what is the framework of trade union activity, recognising that "the trade unions shall defend the interests and rights of the workers and seek to improve their living and working conditions". This responds in part to the ICFTU's comments which refer to the impossibility of creating trade union organisations. The legislation contains no such impossibility. The ICFTU promotes and defends a supposed trade union organisation called "independendent". Huge resources are given for propaganda in the international press in support of a so-called trade union organisation which is known neither by the workers nor by the population and which is not at all representative of the workers. In Cuba there is not one central labour organisation which has organised a union belonging to the supposed trade union organisation fostered by the ICFTU. The impossibility to which the ICFTU refers is not in the legislation, but in the very fact that the workers themselves have not responded to nor supported the call of the ICFTU, which has tried to impose its criteria on how trade unionism should be carried out in the country. In these circumstances, the ICFTU's actions constitute trade union interference which aims at dividing the Cuban workers' movement.

The Committee of Experts also refers to and takes note of the ICFTU's comments on the appointment of trade union leaders and the functions assigned to trade unions as expressed in the statutes of the Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba or in the resolutions it adopts at its congresses. In this respect, the Government recalls that the Labour Code states that trade union organisations and the Central Organisation to which they affiliate voluntarily are governed by and act in accordance with the principles, statutes and standing orders democratically discussed and approved by their members, always in the framework recognised for trade union activity in the Code itself, which is the defence of workers' interests and rights and the improvement of their living and working conditions.

This means that the Government creates the appropriate legal framework for the exercise of trade union activities, but that the contents of trade union constitutions and rules, the ways they elect their leaders and the functions attributed to them in the framework of the resolutions adopted by workers' congresses remains a question exclusively within the jurisdiction of the organisations themselves.

In addition, the Government points out that the observation's comments on the contents of trade union statutes go beyond the framework of Convention No. 87 on freedom of association, since this Convention is limited to recognising the right of employers' and workers' organisations to draw up their own constitutions and rules, to elect their representatives in full freedom, to organise their administration and activities; this right is recognised by the Labour Code and has been exercised in practice by the organisations existing in Cuba.

The Government does not know which provisions of Convention No. 87 on freedom of association allow the ICFTU or the Committee of Experts to set out the criteria for statutes of central trade union organisation when the laws of the country lay down the right of organisation to draw up their own statutes and to function in accordance with trade union principles and with the standing orders democratically discussed and approved by their members, for the defence of workers' rights, in the manner recognised by sections 13 and 15 of the Labour Code.

If the Committee of Experts wishes to have an explanation of these statutes, which do not go beyond the limits of freedom of association, it is not really the Government which should be asked to supply information, and even less in the form of an observation, since this question is outside Convention No. 87 and since these statutes have been drawn up, discussed and approved by the trade union organisations at their workers' congresses.

In addition, a Government representative, referring to the complete written reply of her Government, highlighted that article 13 of the Labour Code recognises the right of all workers, manual and intellectual, to associate themselves voluntarily and to organise unions without any authorisation. The rest of the Labour Code must be viewed in the light of this premise dedicated to trade union action. Also, the mention made in article 15 of the Code about the Central Organisation of Workers is not meant to institutionalise a single union system. This provision is merely aimed to fulfil the requirements of Article 3 of the Convention, and it reaffirms that the union organisations act in pursuance of the principles, by-laws and regulations which are discussed and approved democratically by their members. Even if the regulations and by-laws of the Central Organisation of Workers (CTC) give rise to some misgivings in the view of the Committee of Experts, the Government cannot adopt any measures to change these by-laws because they were adopted freely by the congresses of the workers without any state intervention.

The Workers' members expressed their gratitude to the Government for providing complete written and verbal information to the Conference. Over the years, the Workers have attempted within this Committee to have this Convention applied to the circumstances which existed in those States that had a single party system and a single trade union movement. In many of the countries which have pursued this dialogue, this problem is becoming less and less frequent. To dissipate any misunderstanding, the Workers' members underlined that they were not suggesting that the legislation has to prescribe any one form of trade unionism, be it single or pluralistic. What they were suggesting was that the legislation should make it clear, both in law and subsequently in practice, that workers can establish trade unions of their own choosing. As to the wording of the law which clearly created a misundertanding of what the situation is by referring to the Central Organisation of Workers in Cuba by name, the Workers believed that it would be useful to change the law so that there is no further confusion either in the minds of the Committee of Experts and indeed in the minds of the general population in Cuba. The Workers' members had great difficulty in dealing with a situation in which the party runs the trade unions as well as the Government. Concerning the observation of the Government representative that it would be either for the Government itself or for the Committee of Experts to examine the by-laws of trade unions, this argument did not help to advance the discussion because the party is, in fact, both the Government and the trade union movement. The Workers' members therefore wanted a situation in which it would be possible for any trade union to be set up in Cuba without any intervention from the Government, or the party or anybody else. This was a legitimate argument in their opinion because under Cuban law at the present moment it is not possible for independent trade unions to operate freely. They went to suggest to the Government that it might seek advice from the ILO to reconsider the situation through further consultations inside the country.

The Employers' members stressed that the application of the Convention in Cuba is a well-known case that has been already discussed in the Committee as well as commented upon by the Committee of Experts on five occasions in the past ten years. The question is whether a unified trade union movement laid down by law is in conformity with the Convention. Obviously, if it is imposed by the State, this is incompatible with the Convention. In the past, some governments argued that there is no violation of the Convention if the workers themselves at one particular stage in history have demanded this unity; in such case the unity would result from the wish of these workers, which the State confirmed in one or another form. The Employers' members could never accept this view and the Committee has never accepted it either. Now the Government puts forward new arguments, of a linguistic nature, stating that the Convention simply says that there must be the freedom of choice of trade unions, and once a trade union has been chosen, the Convention has been complied with. This is obviously out of line with the word and spirit of the Convention. The freedom to establish a trade union and the freedom to join it should not just have existed at one point in time, this freedom must be exercisable at any time. In a country where there is trade union unity, a more pluralistic system may arise at any time; this freedom must therefore be upheld. Another linguistic argument used by the Government consists in suggesting that in Cuba a Central trade union organisation is not like a central trade union organisation in other countries where there are competing organisations. Nevertheless, one cannot but note that, as in the past, there is still a system of trade union unity in Cuba which is laid down in law, which is in clear contradiction to the Convention. The Employers' members expressed the hope that the Government will perhaps come up with some new ideas and will actually guarantee this freedom in legislative form so that workers will be able to chose freely the trade union they want to join. At the moment, however, this is not the case and the Employers' members have to note this with regret.

A Workers' member of the United States stated that over all those years the majority of the membership of the Conference Committee has agreed that there is no prohibition in the Convention of trade union unity, but there is a violation of the Convention when that is established by inserting in legislation the name of a single trade union, together with the appointment of the trade union leaders by the Communist party. That is the core of the problem. This Committee has always viewed that kind of legislation as institutionalising a single trade union which is not derived from the will of workers.

The Workers' member of Cuba indicated that the Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba was created even before the revolution and before the adoption of the present Consutution of the Republic. It is completely wrong to claim that trade union leaders in Cuba are appointed by the Communist party; there are more than 300,000 of them in the country, which is about 10 per cent of the labour force, and they were elected as leaders by secret ballot. There is not just one single union organisation in Cuba but one central organisation which brings together 18 national unions; there are more than 70,000 union bodies throughout the country and all working establishments without exception have elected their own leaders. The workers choose their trade union organisation, approve their by-laws and freely make their own decisions.

The Government representative recalled that workers have the right to establish the organisations of their choice in conformity with a article 13 of the Labour Code, this provision being the starting point of any analysis of other articles in this section of the Code. The labour legislation does not contain any reference to the structure of the unions, nor does it contain any requirements as to their activities: this is a question which is decided by the workers themselves. The structure, functions and by-laws of the unions are adopted by them and by the Central Organisations of Workers at their congresses without any intervention of the State. This is why Government cannot put forward any suggestions on the contents of these by-laws.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands asked what the Government and workers would lose if mention of the CTC would be deleted from the law, as according to the declarations of the Government representatives, 98 per cent of workers or even more wished to have a central trade union organisation, and the Government declares not to intervene in the internal affairs of trade unions. It is therefore legitimate to ask why the Government insists so stubbornly on keeping the reference to the CTC in the law if there would not be any change in practice if it were deleted.

The Workers' members reiterated their invitation to the Government to reconsider the situation with the help of the ILO in order that any misunderstanding would be dissipated and progress would be achieved soon in this respect.

The Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, replied that the Cuban Government has requested and received on numerous occasions the assistance of the ILO. When the Government deems it necessary it calls for help taking account of the needs and the realities of the country and not on criteria imposed by others. It is incorrect to say that the Communist party appoints trade union spokespersons; they are nominated and freely elected by the workers. At its last congress a part of the leadership of the Central Organisation of Workers of Cuba was changed by the will of the workers themselves, as it is their right to do. The current leadership was elected from construction and tobacco workers. Cuba is currently engaged in the modification of certain texts, for example Resolution No. 590 and a series of amendments to the Constitution. However, for any modification concerning mention in law of the CTC the decision should be taken by the workers; it cannot be taken by the Government because the initiative has to be taken by the workers. Replying to the Workers' members of the Netherlands, the speaker said that the Government and the workers of Cuba would lose nothing if mention of the CTC would be taken out of the law, but he once again underlined that any modification of the Labour Code in this sense should be discussed with the workers as all of them have participated in the discussions to elaborate the text of the Labour Code. A campaign external to the country seeks to divide the Cuban people, but the workers will not permit this no more than the external world can tell them what form of union organisation should be adopted.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government on points the Committee has been discussing for several years. It stressed the importance of the existence of independent trade unions which it regrettably felt bound to conclude do not seem to exist in the country. Therefore the Committee urged the Government to consult with the ILO on the situation under debate. It hoped that the Government will send a full report on these questions to the competent organs of the ILO and that the Committee will be able to conclude the situation being in full conformity with the Convention at one of its next sessions.

The Workers' member of Cuba assured that in his country trade union organisations were independent and requested that his reservation on this conclusion be reflected.

Ecuador (ratification: 1967). The Government has communicated the following information:

With regard to the observations of the Committee of Experts, the Government emphasises that the amendments in the Labour Code which were introduced by Act No. 33 were the result of important discussions and debates at the national level. The Act in question updates the Labour Code of 1938 and responds to the needs of contemporary economic and commercial reality without losing sight of the intangibility of the guarantees on labour matters contained in international Conventions.

Act No. 133 constitutes important progress in the protection of workers' interests. In order to approach professional relations more seriously and to guarantee a right of appeal to workers to claim their rights in the event of a loss of their source of income, the Act also introduces in the legislation two new bases for a strike (section 63(6) and (7)), and it increases the fines imposed in general on employers when they violate the provisions of the law which protects workers.

The opinions expressed during previous meetings with representatives of chambers of commerce and with workers' organisations were taken into consideration during the drawing up reforms of the legislation.

Within the National Assembly, the Commission for Labour and Social Affairs is responsible for initiating the constitutional procedure provided for reform drafts which are proposed by the executive as well as for the propositions made to this organ by the United Workers' Front and the Ecuadorian Confederation of Class Organisations.

The goal of the reforms is to establish a balanced and equitable instrument to regulate professional relations to the extent that these reforms aim to correct defective procedures, make the exercise of the right of appeal quick and flexible, and improve the degree of individual protection of workers.

The increase in the minimum number of workers necessary to form trade unions (sections 53 and 55 of Act No. 133).

The Government is of the view that the exercise of the right to form trade unions is not hampered by sections 53 and 55 of Act No. 133 which increases the minimum number of form trade unions. Indeed, the first paragraph of Article 8 of Convention No. 87 stipulates that in exercising the rights provided for in the Convention workers shall respect the law of the land. Consequently, this international instrument confers on each country the authority to determine, in the light of national realities, the necessary number of workers. It is precisely the economic, productive and social realities prevailing in Ecuador that have made it necessary to revise the minimum number of workers needed to form trade unions; the old rule was adopted in 1938, at a time where the industrial and professional development was still entirely in its initial stage. Today, the country is undergoing a process of economic, industrial and customs union at the regional and subregional levels. As of 30 April 1992, 41 workers' organisations had been established in virtue of Act No. 133. It is equally important to underline that the legislator has paid particular attention to the protection of acquired rights and to the legal personality of organisations established prior to the entry into force of the said Act. To this end, a transitional provision has been incorporated into the Act.

The decision of the Minister of Labour concerning minimum services in the event of a strike (Section 69 of Act No. 133)

The legislator is of the view that the Government has the fundamental obligation to look after the functioning of minimum services in the event of a strike in institutions whuch provide services which are essential to the social or public interest. This is not a rule which applies generally, but rather is a provision of an exceptional nature, which is applicable to institutions which provide essential services in the social or public interest. Within this narrow scope of application, the provision in question applies only in case of a disagreement between the parties. It should be pointed out as an antecedent that since 1991, the country has suffered terribly from the effects of a serious cholera epidemic. Due to this fact, it was indispensable that hospital and health services, particularly those situated in rural zones lacking in sanitary facilities, continue to function. However, in these circumstances, national and regional strikes were called by workers in the health sector which competely paralysed the medical services. This situation not only led to the death of persons affected by cholera because they had not received the necessary medical care but also put parts of the population deprived of this essential public service in great danger. Any society, and especially one which is on the brink of poverty, has without any doubt a fundamental obligation to maintain the right of its citizens to life and to health. Confronted with this reality, the Government was obliged to adopt, without, however, hampering the right to strike or other actions with similar claims, adequate measures in order to ensure a minimum guarantee for the running of essential services. These measures apply once the period of time provided for in the law has run out and the parties are still not able to agree on the maintenance of these services.

Drafts of amendments to labour legislation

In the context of the commitment made by the Government towards the International Labour Organisation, the Minister of Labour took many steps within the National Assembly to include in the reforms drawn up by this organ in labour matters, the examination of draft modifications and of legislative interpretations of provisions which were the object of observations by the Committee of Experts. In the light of this commitment and considering that it is in the interest of the Government to regularise the application of ratified international Conventions, the Minister of Labour, in his communication No. DM–900116 of 18 April 1991, asked the President of the Assembly to initiate the constitutional procedure regarding the draft legislation which was submitted to this legislative body on 22 May 1990. Following this, in a communication No. AIT–91102 of 19 July 1991, the Ministry of Labour asked the Vice-President of the Commission for Labour and Social Affairs of the Assembly, to proceed in the examination of reforms of the Labour Code. Finally, in a communication No. AIT–91117 of 12 August 1991, the Minister of Labour himself addressed the Vice-President of the said Commission and immediately asked it to advance in the examination and the adoption of the legislative reforms introduced on 22 May 1990. Under these conditions, the Government reiterates its intention to continue asking the competent authorities of the National Assembly to examine and approve the draft legislation, the end result of which will be determined by this legislative organ.

The Government has enclosed a copy of the communications mentioned in its report.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Human Resources, supplied information on the efforts made by his Government to revise the country's labour legislation. Recalling that, in November 1989, at the request of President Dr. Rodrigo Borja, the ILO had undertaken a consultative mission to Ecuador to examine, among others, issues relating to the application of the Convention, draft legislation which took into account the suggestion made by the ILO mission had been presented to Congress. As of this time the draft legislation had not been adopted into law. Noting that communications had been sent to the President of Congress in April 1991 and the President of the Labour Law Committee in July 1991, he regretted that in spite of the close relations of these persons with trade union activists, no action had been taken on the draft legislation, leaving unresolved certain questions of application raised by the Committee of Experts. The speaker invited the Workers' members of his country to join with the Government in its efforts to adopt the draft legislation before the closing of the present legislative session in August 1992. As concerned the specific points raised by the Committee of Experts in its observation on the problems in applying of Act No. 133 of 1991 to reform the Labour Code, in relation to the Convention, the speaker referred to the context of this reform. The reform had been made after a significant period of consultation with workers' and employers' organisations, consultations which had never taken place before in the history of constitutional democracy in Ecuador. Act No. 133 brought many improvements for workers; unfortunately, the Committee of Experts' observations took up only two points. Act No. 133 did not violate the explicit provisions of the Convention. The Convention did not stipulate a permissible minimum number of persons for establishing a workers' organisation, a level suggested to be between 20 and 30 workers. Changes in economic and social conditions of his country had obliged an amendment of the Labour Code of 1938, increasing the required minimum of 15 workers to 30. The speaker recalled the comments recently made by the President of the Republic of Zambia to the Conference that efforts should be made to ensure that legislation does not hamper business activity, as well as the offer of the Director-General of the ILO to provide technical assistance to countries seeking to make labour legislation more flexible in the light of new social and economic conditions. The Government had introduced elements of flexibility in its labour legislation and was going to examine the practical results of Act No. 133; in the six months it had been in force, 41 workers' organisations had been registered and the frequency of labour disputes had dropped. As concerns the decision of the Ministry of Labour, in the event of disagreement between the parties, on the level of minimum services to be maintained in the event of a strike in services that are considered to be essential – referred to by the Committee of Experts in its observation – the speaker expressed the view that strikes in essential services, particularly hospitals, had produced desperate situations for local populations. The regulation of strikes had to be considered in a broad social context, both by governments as well as by trade unions. In any case, under Act No. 133, the number of cases in which a strike could be called had been extended. In conclusion, he emphasised the need to revise the labour legislation in such a way as to meet the principal preoccupation of government: unemployment and underemployment. As unemployment had been a priority issue for government, measures had to be taken to encourage creation of enterprises.

The Workers' members were deeply disappointed that the Government did not take advantage of the opportunity offered by the adoption of Law No. 133 in order to put its legislation in conformity with the Convention as well as to implement the points contained in the comments of the Committee of Experts over the last several years. This was all the more so because of the fact that this case had been previously discussed on several occasions, that two ILO missions had visited Ecuador (1986-89) during which the Government had taken on certain undertakings, and that special paragraphs were included in the Committee's report to the Conference in 1988 and 1989. Despite the fact that the Committee of Experts made, at least on one occasion, a positive comment about Law No. 133 (an increase in the number of justifications for going on strike) they considered this law raised previously non-existing problems. In conclusion, they noted that unfortunately nothing had changed regarding the serious violations raised for a number of years by the Committee of Experts. Law No. 133 could very well be a ploy on the part of the Government to avoid making basic changes in the Labour Code by amending only certain articles and thus claiming to fulfil the requests of this Committee. The Government had stated, however, that the basic changes requested by the Committee of Experts had only been submitted to the National Congress by one of its members. It seemed to them, therefore, that the fate of the trade union movement had become the task of an individual member of Congress and regretted to note the decline in the State's responsibilities in this area. They considered, therefore, that the serious problems of the application of the Convention remain unchanged: the prohibition placed on public servants from setting up trade unions, the intolerable interference by the Government in the internal administration of trade unions as well as on matters touching on the very existence of the trade union movement, the Government's negative attitude about freedom of association and the dynamic role that trade unionism could play in the economy and in the development of the country, the increase of the minimum number of workers required for the establishment of trade union associations. In fact the Convention does not specify any such number and it was evident that the increase in the minimum number required tended to diminish, in reality, the possibilities of workers to create trade union organisations as well as their power to defend their interest. The workers' members strongly urged the Government to be more active in ending, as soon as possible, the long-standing problems raised and thus fully implement in practice the provisions of the Convention.

The Employers' members referred to the three points raised by the Committee of Experts regarding Law No. 133. They did not wish to make further comment on the extension of the number of cases in which a strike can be called, as this aspect of the law had not been criticised by the Committee of Experts. They recalled, however, that the Experts considered problems could arise regarding the other two aspects of the law (the increase in the minimum number of workers required for the establishment of trade union associations and the decision by the Ministry of Labour, in the event of disagreement between the parties, on the minimum services to be maintained in the event of a strike). Apparently the Experts were not sure on this point and the workers' members expressed the same doubts as well. Although a good number of countries did require a minimum number of workers for the establishment of trade unions, the employers were of the view that it was not necessary to fix such a minimum number. As the convention was silent on this question they felt that it should be the practice in reality that should resolve the question. The Experts considered the minimum number established in the Ecuadorian legislation (the figure was increased from 15 to 30) to be a dubious one. The Employers' members did not wish to pursue this point because, as already stated, they felt it was the practice in reality that should provide solutions. As regards the decisions made by the Ministry of Labour, in the event of disagreement between the parties, on the minimum services to be maintained in the event of a strike, the Employers' members considered that it was necessary to maintain emergency services. A decision should rapidly be made in the event that the parties failed to agree on the definition of such services. In their opinion, this decision should be made by the employer and that such decision could successfully withstand legal challenges. They considered medical services to be part of essential services that should not be interrupted and for which the minimum requirements should be clearly established. The Experts required other changes regarding the five points discussed previously by the Conference Committee. the Employers' members considered these points to have varying degrees of importance. With regard to the penalties for strikes they assumed this referred to illegal strikes. In view of the fact that this Committee was not aware of the clear definition of an illegal strike in the country, they felt this question should be left pending for the time being. With regard to the administrative dissolution of a works council when its membership drops below 25 per cent of the total number of workers, they considered that the Convention did not contain specific provisions on this point. In such a case they considered that the general principle that, on such matters, freedom, understood in the widest sense possible, should apply and that practice in reality should resolve the details of its application. The other points, namely, the prohibition placed on public servants from setting up trade unions, the requirement that members of the executive committees of a works council be Ecuadorian, as well as the prohibition placed on unions from taking part in religious or political activities, were, in their view, unjustified interferences in the exercise of freedom of association. With regard to the four drafts presented to the National Congress by one of its members referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, the employers' members requested the government's representative to provide information on the content of these amendments as well as on the prospects for their adoption. Considering that it was up to the Government, in the end, to take appropriate measures regarding the criticisms made, they requested for all useful information in this respect.

A Workers' member of the United States, on behalf of the Workers' members, regretted the fact that this was a long-standing problem in need of remedial action. He was all the more concerned because of the absence of information from the Government representative on the results of the 1986 direct contacts mission. Six years after this mission, the situation remained unchanged. The exasperation of the workers finally led the workers to insist on, and obtain, a lengthy special paragraph in the report on the question. He requested the Government representative to indicate to this Committee which recommendations of the direct contacts mission received follow up in order to initiate the badly needed reforms and which ones were not, and the reasons for such failure.

The Workers' member of Ecuador deplored the fact that the changes to the Labour Code introduced by Act No. 133 of 1991 signified a step backwards of 50 years in the area of freedom of associations, collective bargaining, and the right to strike and that the Government had taken no measures to go ahead with the adoption in Parliament of the draft legislation prepared with the ILO's technical assistance and which concerned four of the points raised by the Committee of Experts for many years. Regarding the establishment of trade unions, and, specifically, the increase of the minimum number of workers (from 15 to 30) included in Act No. 133, the Government had justified this provision in the press by stating that it was aimed at increasing employment, and that if trade unions were to be restricted to enterprises with more than 30 workers, more small enterprises would be created. This was a violation of the Convention, especially when account was taken of the fact that most undertakings in Ecuador did not have the above-mentioned minimum legal number of employees. In addition, attainmnent of this minimum number might be easily frustrated, lost by the dismissal of members, since all that was needed for dismissal was the simple payment of compensation. In addition, the creation of trade unions faced obstacles in the Ministry of Labour which, in many cases and repeatedly, returned the trade union constitutions without having registered them because of minor problems with formalities such as the omission of a word, fullstop or comma, thus violating the legislation. In relation to the prohibition on public servants from setting up trade unions, the President of the Republic had stated in the press that unionism in the public sector was the shortest road to the dissolution of the State; this concept inspired the Government's policy on trade unionism. Public servants could also not bargain collectively or sign collective agreements. In addition, section 73 of the Armed Forces Act denied civilian employees in undertakings attached to the Armed Forces the right to form trade union organisations. He also criticised the regulation of minimum services to be provided in the event of a strike in essential services as set out in Act No. 133. The range of public and private activities which do not correspond to "essential services"; minimum services must be maintained with at least 20 per cent of the workers and, when the parties did not agree on the number of workers required to guarantee that service, the Ministry of Labour decided the matter. This was the case in the public sector as well, where the State was both judge and petitioner. If the workers did not accept the minimum service decided by the Ministry, they could be dismissed and new workers could be recruited, including those subject to civil liability. He criticised the provisions of Act No. 133 concerning the need to establish a sole central committee representing 50 per cent of the workers in a company, undertaking or industry of the public sector so as to be able to bargain collectively. Such a committee in fact replaced unions and disappeared once a collective agreement was signed, thus making any follow-up on the agreement impossible. Moreover, the required percentage of 50 per cent for negotiation could be very difficult to attain. In concluding, he recalled that the case had been discussed for many years and supported the Committie of Experts' observations; he hoped that the Committee of Experts would examine the points to which he had referred.

The Employers' member of Ecuador stated that the intervention of the Workers' member of Ecuador was highly exaggerated and gave a picture which did not correspond at all to the situation existing in the country. He deplored the fact that the trade union organisations had not wanted to take part in the first stage of the work on revision of the Labour Code and had participated in an unsatisfactory manner in the subsequent phase. He regretted that the questions were being interpreted out of context and that there had been no mention of the labour victories gained through Act No. 133: increase in compensation for unjustified dismissal; possibility for unions to intervene as parties in judicial proceedings where the State had lodged a petition against an undertaking; possibility to exercise the right to strike during collective bargaining; creation of a tripartite minimum wages council; abolition of the low level of protection against dismissal for workers having permanent contracts. As for the right to unionise in the public sector, a restrictive standard did exist, but only in theory – and statements of the President of the Republic had explained this – because most public servants in Ecuador had enjoyed this right since the revision of section 125 of the Constitution in 1978. Trade unions existed in municipalities, in the petroleum sector, in the electricity sector, etc., and for this reason Act No. 133 regulated the minimum sercices to be maintained in the case of a strike. This was because, in such essential services, the community had a more valuable interest than that which trade union leaders wished to impose – although it was also valuable – and the country could not for that reason be at their mercy. The increase in the minimum number of workers for the establishment of a trade union contained an implicit reference to informality in a context where undertakings faced many restrictions. A choice had had to be made between rigid legislation and a flexible, sensible and prudent legality in which all factors were present. Finally, he indicated that the minimum services to be maintained in the case of a strike met the requirements of equality in labour relations and in the exercise of the rights of all parties. Trade union organisations had on many occasions signed clauses concerning minimum services.

A Workers' member of France noted that statements made by the Employers' member of Ecuador would make one believe that the situation was satisfactory and the serious criticisms made by the Experts in their report should be overlooked. The statement did not include new points that would eliminate the need to amend the provisions prohibiting civil servants to form unions and the impediments on freedom of association. In addition the efforts made by an Employers' member to convince this Committee that it would be possibe to put Ecuador in the hands of workers, despite the numerous obstacles contained in the laws, was beyond him. Taking into account the need to insist upon the changes requested by the Committee of Experts he expressed his expectation that the Government would do everything possible to change the laws along the lines suggested by the Committee of Experts and that the Ecuadorian employers would in the future respect not only the laws but the workers in the country.

The Workers' member of Ecuador stated that the trade union organisations had sent their suggestions in writing to the Government concerning the reform of the Labour Code and that the Government had not retained them. Given the differences of opinion between the members of this Committee, he asked that an ILO mission visit Ecuador so as to obtain information on the application of the Convention.

A Workers' member of Colombia deplored the fact that the Employers' member of Ecuador considered the informal economy as the panacea of Latin America and sought justification for the disappearance of the trade union movement. The problems proposed by the savage capitalist model had to be looked at jointly in Latin America. Since there had been no reply given to the points raised by the Workers' member of Ecuador, the Committee of Experts would have to examine them next year.

A Workers' member of Pakistan pointed out that the right to organise, recognised in the Convention, was equally pertinent to workers and employers. He appealed to the employers to show concern in this case even if it only involved the right of workers to organise because the power of the government to dissolve such organisations could be also applicable to them. In his view, trade unions always put their communities' interests ahead of their own. He expressed the hope that the national legislation in Ecuador would soon be put into full conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom, on behalf of the Workers' members, expressed his doubts about the reassurances given by the Government representative that his Government did not wish to restrict the right of workers to organise. Workers in public enterprises such as electrical and oil companies were granted certain rights while employees of the state administration were still deprived of their right to organise. He was particularly concerned about civil servants in Ecuador who were denied the right to organise under the law of that country.The Convention clearly recognised their rights in this respect: he referred to the countless examples of civil service unions throughout the world. If civil service unions had not existed a number of leading members on the Workers' bench on the Committee would not have appeared and taken part in the work of the Committee. They recognised the right to strike had in recent years been queried by some employers as not being integral to the Convention but this Committee and the Committee of Experts had reaffirmed this right. Unless the Government representative could offer clarifications on the concerns addressed by this Committee and unless the Government could assure the Committee that his country will soon be in full conformity with this Convention they would be urging that this Committee re-examine the case next year. In the event that no progress is reported next year, they would be requesting that the matter be dealt with in a special paragraph in the Committee's report.

The Government representative regretted the attitude of certain Workers' members, and, in particular, of the Workers' member of Ecuador whose tergiversation prevented any advance and had repercussions on the internal politics of the country. An example of this tergiversation was that Act No. 133 implied a step backwards of 50 years because it allegedly removed all the labour victories contained in existing law. He recalled in this respect that the trade union organisations had at the outset rejected participation in the process for reform of the Code and that, despite this, he had met with the trade union leaders – including the Workers' member of Ecuador – and managed to arrive at an agreement which settled eight or ten basic questions. It also had to be pointed out that under the present system 400 new trade union organisations had been established. He stated that he was willing to defend, together with the parties who so wished, the revision drafts which had been prepared with ILO assistance. He read them out to the Committee. He also recalled that the Member of Parliament who introduced these drafts in Parliament had done so at the request of the Government. Finally, he pointed out that the trade union organisatiaons were involved in the noble fight for better conditions, but should not lose sight of the circumstances necessary for efficiency in public and private enterprises.

The Employers' members considered that this dialogue was necessary in view of the fact that the last time the Government spoke to this Committee was three years ago. The discussions, in their view, went beyond the points contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and they thought it was not appropriate to go into the details. Both the report of the Committee of Experts and the statement of the Minister referred to the positive changes made but they thought other changes were still needed. The Employers' members hoped that the Government would be able, as soon as possible, to provide this Committee and the Committee of Experts with a detailed written report in this respect.They urged that the Committee's conclusions concentrate on the large areas of agreement between the Workers and Employers regarding these suggestions.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government but recalled that the subject-matter had been discussed a number of times before and that its conclusions have been mentioned in special paragraphs of its reports. It found small signs of progress in the Bill to amend the labour legislation pending before Parliament. It asked the Government to take appropriate measures to bring its labour legislation into full conformity with international standards and to ensure implementation in the very near future, taking into account the great importance attached by this Committee to freedom of association. It urged the Government to send the relevant documents to the ILO as soon as possible and it decided to examine the case at its next session and hoped to note with satisfaction measures taken in this respect.

Ethiopia (ratification: 1963). A Government representative acknowledged that the Committee of Experts had been making observations concerning the application of the Convention for the past ten years. The Ministry of Labour had been aware of these observations, and had conducted several studies to revise Labour Proclamation No. 64/1975 and other labour-related legislation in order to conform with the relevant ILO Conventions. However, the political situation in Ethiopia at the time did not favour the enactment of a progressive labour law. The country was now experiencing a new era of peace and democracy. The Transitional Government had issued a Democratic Charter fully endorsing the principles of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights; it guaranteed freedom of conscience, expression, association and peaceful assembly and demonstration, and specifically provided that a just labour law protecting the rights and interests of workers should be promulged. She stated that the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs was now preparing a new draft Labour Code, taking into account the comments of the Committee of Experts and making all possible efforts to bring the law into conformity with the principles of ILO Conventions ratified by Ethiopia, as well as principles in Conventions which it had not ratified, in particular those stipulating fundamental standards regarding working conditions. The draft law provided that workers may organise without interference from public authorities. A single trade union system was not imposed, and federations and confederaations could be formed upon the initiative of workers. Employers may also establish and join employers' organisations. She noted that the Labour Proclamation of 1975 and Proclamation 222/83 omitted the question of the right of association of employers. She stated that trade unions did not need to obtain previous authorisation from competent authorities in order to affiliate, either with national organisations or with international organisations, and were not subjecst to any kind of scrutiny. They could establish their own constitution and by-laws and organise their administration and activities as they wished in order to achieve their objectives. Under the draft law, trade unions were no longer obligated to dissiminate government ideology or serve as government spokesmen. They were free to protect their members' interests and to negotiate with employers on any labour matters. The right to strike in furtherance and defence of their interests was recognised. A tripartite tribunal was authorised to determine the legality of strikes, but no unnecessary conditions restricting the exercise of the right to strike were imposed. Lockouts by employers were also permitted. It was emphasised that the draft law, which replaced all previous labour legislation, was comprehensive, and covered all forms of employment relationships existing between workers and their employers. An effective labour inspectorate was established, and inspectors were empowed to bring court proceedings in respect of any violation of the labour law. Tripartite consultation was stressed for all spheres of industrial relations. The Government representative noted that the draft labour law had been discussed at length in the Council of Ministers, and that the final draft would be submitted this summer to the Council of Representatives, which was the highest competent authority in the country. The Government intended to send the text of the law to the Committee of Experts so that it could be examined in detail to determine whether it conformed with ILO standards; any suggestions from the Committee of Experts would be welcomed, as there remained an opportunity to improve the draft law prior to presentation for debate in the Council of Representatives. She noted that during the Organisation of African Unity's Commission Conference, the Prime Minister had informed the ILO Director-General that the Government was committed to implementing the principles of ILO Conventions and stated that the final text would be sent to the ILO as soon as it was adopted.

The Employers' members considered that the statement of the Government representative was very good news, especially when compared to that which they had heard about the case in previous years. In many ways, legislation and practice in this country contravened the Convention: for example, a single trade union system was imposed, trade unions were required to represent particular political views, and there was an absence of employers' organisations. In the report of the Committee of Experts it was pointed out that the transitional Government had undertaken the revision of the labour legislation. The Government representative referred to the content of this new legislation, which seemed to meet all the points referred to in the Report of the Committee of Experts. They hoped that all the discrepancies between the Convention and national legislation would be eliminated in this way. It was clear that a democratic State was pluralist by nature and could not impose a political point of view on social groups. They encouraged the Government to put its intentions into practice as soon as possible so that at a later stage the Committee of Experts might ascertain whether the points raised had actually been addressed.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for informing them about the improvements and developments noted in the report of the Committee of Experts. As they had been waiting to receive the text prepared by the committee responsible for revising the national legislation, the Experts could only refer to the previous comments which noted the discrepancies between the legislation in force and the Convention. In this respect, it was necessary to raise two matters. Firstly, as the 1983 General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining had clearly indicated the legislation could not impose a single trade union system. If the workers themselves decided to form a single trade union, this was their right, but other choices – in particular, trade union pluralism – must remain possible. The second point concerned the crucial importance of the right to strike as an essential element of freedom of association. It was hoped that in the examination of this question the Government would duly take into account the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the conclusions of the Committee of Experts. Finally, in view of the importance of the announced changes, it was essential that the legislative text be supplied in the near future to the ILO, so that the Committee of Experts could examined the planned legislation to determine whether it had eliminated the discrepancies that had been pointed out for many years.

A Workers' member from Italy considered that it was necessary to take into account the very serious economic and political conditions faced by Ethiopia during its transition towards democracy. It was necessary for this democratisation process to gain support from ILO assistance and from bilateral relations.

A Government member of Germany referred to the fundamental changes which had taken place in recent months in Ethiopia, which had not only brought peace to the country but had also led to a completely different political, economic and social orientation. The events which were related by the Government representative were further evidence that the Government was proceeding in the right direction. These statements demonstrated the influence which ILO standards could have on the national legislation of member States. The Government representative from Germany wished to join in the comments made by the preceding speakers and hoped that in the next report of the Committee of Experts, it would be able to take note of significant changes in this case.

The Government representative reiterated that the Government would send an English translation of the draft labour law to the Committee of Experts for its review; the draft was approved by the Council of Ministers in June 1992.

The Committee welcomed the information given by the Government. It understood that the Transitional Government had started a process of changing the existing labour legislation, with a view to bringing it into full conformity with the Convention, which process had already led to a draft. It noted that the Government had mentioned that that draft was likely to be passed during this calendar year. It also noted the Government's undertaking to send a copy of the draft to the ILO as soon as possible, which undertaking was welcomed. It therefore hoped that the Committee of Experts would be able to find the legislation in conformity with the Convention in its next report.

Honduras (ratification: 1956). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government is aware of the need to reform its Labour Code with a view to bringing it into conformity with ratified Conventions and social developments in this field. The Government's will as concerns these changes has been expressed by the President of the Republic on different occasions; this interest has been translated into the creation of a Special Commission, in which the Government's will to make these changes as well as all those which arise on tripartite level to the extent possible, with the intent to secure agreement of all the interested sectors. The Government has at the same time implemented a project entitled "Modernisation and institutional reinforcement of the labour administration in support of the economic reorganisation programme", of which this Special Commission has knowledge. The objectives of this project correspond with those of the Special Commission. The Government nevertheless understands the Committee of Experts' preoccupation with the period of time – many years – which has elapsed since the Committee's first observation without the necessary amendments having been accomplished. The Government will continue to regularly inform the Committee of Experts on the progress which it has achieved.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, referred to the enormous and serious problems faced by his country in all areas. He indicated that his Government generally encouraged dialogue and consultations in all sectors. Referring to the observations of the Committee of Experts he pointed out some contradictions that existed between certain articles of the Labour Code and the provisions of the Convention even though these contradictions might only relate to minor points. For example, it was a requirement to obtain the consent of a certain percentage of workers or, in some public enterprises, the approval of certain authorities before calling a strike. However, the right to strike was not prohibited. The Government has decided that the adoption of a new Labour Code or the substantial reform of the existing one should be based on and the product of consultations in the country as it was useless to legislate arbitrarily or adopt idealistic standards. In doing this it was necssary to take into account the suggestions of the Committee of Experts as well as the assistance offered by the ILO. Two very productive seminars, which helped bring out the initial cooperation required from the different sectors, were conducted. A tripartite committee chaired by the Deputy Minister of Labour has been established in order to change the structures of Honduran labour legislation and to follow up the comments of the Committee of Experts and its results would be seen in the course of this year. Finally, he indicated that the Government would be sending its observations along with conclusive evidence on the complaints pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association and expressed the desire to cooperate with the ILO as requested.

The Workers' members welcomed the information provided by the Minister concerning the setting up of a tripartite Committee to advise on the changes that need to be made to the Labour Code to put it into full conformity with the Convention. They also welcomed the information about the Government's consultations with the ILO on these questions. While all these were encouraging developments, they recalled that the Committee of Experts had been making its comments on this question for many years now and no legislative measures have yet been adopted to amend the Labour Code. Referring to the strong language used by the Committee of Experts in its report, they emphasised to the Government the need for it to examine these comments, including the seven specific areas in which the Committee of Experts found the existing Labour Code to require amendments to bring it into line with the provisions of the Convention. In view of past long delays in this case, they strongly urged the Government to do its utmost to adopt legislative texts to amend the Labour Code as soon as possible as well as to ensure their full application in practice.

The Employers' members considered that the seven points figuring in the Committee of Experts' comment did not have the same weight. The ban on workers employed in small agricultural undertakings and stock-raising enterprises form joining a union, the ban on more than one union per enterprise, or the requirement that trade union leaders be engaged in the occupation or profession represented by the union for more than six months violated the very text of the Convention. The Employers' members were therefore in agreement with the comments made on these points by the Experts and considered, like them, that the Government should take the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. They also expressed the hope that the Government would amend the legislation in the near future. However, the other points criticised by the Committee of Experts could not be directly based on the Convention. When the Convention was drawn up in 1948, the question of introducing the right to strike, for example, had not been retained in the text. The comments of the Committee of Experts on national legislation in relation to essential services and other aspects of the right to strike were not therefore founded on the Convention itself. As regards the legal requirement of a two-thirds majority of a union's general assembly for calling a strike, the Employers' members noted that, in many countries, the majority required for calling a strike was governed by legislation or through trade union statutes, and that in any case when trade union statutes were silent on this point, it was for the State to determine the parameters since every strike involved some disruption. The definition of the required majority was a national question which had to be settled by the law and practice of the country. In the light of these considerations, the Employers' members did not share the Experts' opinion that the requirement of a two-thirds majority of a union's general assembly for calling a strike constituted a violation of a Convention.

The Workers' member of Honduras confirmed that a tripartite commission for the revision of the Labour Code had in fact been designated for bringing the Code into conformity with the Convention, along the lines of the comments of the Committee of Experts, but with one exception: the recommendation that more than one enterprise union be allowed to exist in the same enterprise, institution or establishment. In fact, compliance with this recommendation would open the doors in Honduras to the serious phenomenon of solidarist organisations, which some employers were trying to introduce to take over the activities belonging of trade union organisations. He indicated that, in 1991, the Confederation of Honduran Workers had signed a document with the President of the Republic in search of an immediate process for the revision of the Code so as to prevent the rise of solidarism. Subsequently, the employers' and workers' organisations had presented amendments along these lines to the competent authorities. Finally, he stressed that a final date should be fixed for completion of consultations on the various revisions of the Labour Code, and stated that if cooperation did not succeed, the Government would have to take the appropriate decisions.

The Government representative stated that the Government saw no problems with submitting the Committee of Experts' recommendations to Congress. He repeated his earlier statements on the need for cooperation which would lead to the processing of the reforms, because the contents of some of them could be subject to controversy between workers and employers.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government. It welcomed the progress which was being made, in particular in relation to the reform of the Labour Code which was being prepared. However, it recalled that the Committee of Experts had been drawing the Government's attention to the legislative provisions requiring revision and yet until now such revision had not occurred. Consequently, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would very rapidly be able to have the necessary reforms adopted and that it would send the relevant texts to the ILO.

Kuwait (ratification: 1961). A Government representative referred to the reasons why the Government had not been able to implement the Convention, and stated that the Government had started, on its return home last year, to look into the observations of the Committee of Experts. Kuwait had set up a committee in order to carry out a final study on the possibility of drawing up a draft Labour Code, in consultation with the General Federation of Kuwaiti Workers and the Chambers of Commerce and Industry, taking also into account the observations of the Committee of Experts. This committee had finished studying the draft Code which was being submitted to the legislative authorities. Labour relations had gone beyond Act No. 38 of 1964; workers had been able to enjoy their rights through bilateral negotiations and collective agreements which had been authenticated by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, and had become a referral point for courts. Under section 13 of the Act, workers and employers have the right to organise. Another element clarified by this Act was the role of these organisations. The law recognises the right of workers to freedom of association and the right to organise, and therefore made trade unions legitimate and legal from the point of view of the law. The speaker emphasised that Kuwait had made great strides in developing labour relations and the trade union movement, as well as the protection of workers' rights and the improvement of conditions of work, in accordance with provisions of the Convention. The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs no longer had wide powers of supervision. The Ministry was confined to give assistance that trade unions might require from the Government. The Ministry also had the right to control any activity which may be contrary to national law. As to the eligibility of non-Kuwaiti workers to hold trade union office, the text of the Act does not expressly prohibit them from being elected or from holding trade union office in accordance with Chapter 3, section 72. Concerning the system of a single trade union, in order to protect the rights of workers the Government had enabled workers to set up more than one trade union. In relation to workers' grievances, the settlement of labour disputes and the imposition of arbitration, he indicated that Act No. 38 provided that workers' complaints might be settled on a bilateral basis. The trade union is authorised to act on behalf of workers in accordance with this Act, but the Act is not applicable to employers' complaints against workers. The decisions of the arbitration body are final and binding. Since labour disputes are delicate and sensitive issues which require rapid resolution, they are dealt with by a subsidiary body of the court of appeals, referred to in section 88 of the Act, following fair and just procedures, in accordance with the Convention.

The Workers' members stated that this case had been discussed in the Conference Committee in 1981, 1982 and 1983. The Committee of Experts in its report referred to the Government's information to the effect that the Convention had helped to strengthen freedom of association and trade union organisation, develop union activities and orient trade union freedom towards its goals in terms of defending workers' rights; it also referred to a new draft Labour Code. However, since the legislative and practical position had not changed, the Committee of Experts recalled the current divergencies, including provisions on trade union monopoly, restrictions on union activities for foreign workers, supervisory powers of the authorities as to the functioning of union organisation and above all restrictions on the free exercise of the right to strike.The Workers' members also felt it necessary to express their view on the right to strike so as to maintain balance in the report and for the future work of the Committee, since the Employers' members spokesman had continually during the examination of individual cases mentioned this to explicate the Employers' attitude. The Workers' members repeated clearly and unequivocally their support for the Committee of Experts' interpretation of the right to strike, both as regards the right to strike in general, not only as concerned the way in which it was carried out, but also possibly limited. They considered the Experts had correctly applied working methods and principles referred to in paragraph 6 of their general report. The right to strike in principle and as it is practised under the law was an essential means of realising trade union freedom. It was also a basic ingredient of trade union freedom. The Committee of Experts' opinion was not new, and it had been known for many years; the Committee of Experts repeatedly confirmed it in its report. Their view was founded on case law of the tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association and there was no reason to change the established views. Contrary to the Employers' members' spokeman's ideas, universality of standards does not allow selective interpretation of freedom of association and the elements making it up – including the right to strike – according to the political system or the economic or social situation of a given country. The Workers' members reiterated their position in the discussion of problems related to the exercise of the right the stike in Kuwait. Referring to the Government representative's statements that the Government was trying to improve the situation, and that a draft Code had been prepared, the Workers' members thought it necessary for the Government to transmit without delay information for examination by the Committee of Experts on all points mentioned in its report to the Office, so that the Conference Committee could follow developments and examine the case again next year.

The Employers' members recognised the extraordinary circumstances that the Government had faced in the past few months and appreciated the rapidness with which it had come back to this issue and had proceeded to submit a draft Code to the legislature. They considered that the Government should submit a copy of the draft legislation to the ILO in order for the Committee of Experts to have a better appreciation of the degree to which the requirements of the Convention were met. As regards the right to strike, they recalled their position that the finding of a detailed regulatory scheme relating to the right to strike is not appropriate under Convention No. 87 because the words "right to strike" do not appear in the text of the Convention. The Conference Committee, in deciding not to consider the controversial issue of the right to strike, simply did not address it and made clear that the instrument deals with "freedom of association and not the right to strike." The Employers' members recalled the remarks they had made in 1991 that many of the decisions and interpretations of the Committee of Experts were drawn from decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, and that the latter Committee was not limited to the words found in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and was in a position to espouse general principles. They therefore noted their reservaion with respect to the right to strike and the Experts' findings, in particular that restrictions could not be placed in the case of strikes in the essential services in the strict sense of the term, which they considered going too far in terms of what Convention No. 87 contemplates. With the above-mentioned reservation, the Employers' members associated themselves with the comments of the Workers' members and hoped that the Government would soon be on a position to report that it is conforming with the requirements of the Convention.

A Workers' member of France stated that the case had been discussed for several years and referred to the situation of migrant workers, a large part of the workforce. Since restrictions on freedom of association concerned these workers' might be considered in Kuwait very few people could join a union. The very nature of political power was undemocratic: far from being democratic, the regime was feudal: promised amendments had not been made, migrant workers were subject to restrictions, compulsory service at will, and placed outside legislation. The Government should make it clear whether proposals for amendments would explicitly eliminate discrimination against foreign workers. As regards the right to strike, the speaker stated that it was part of international labour standards and any government which undertakes to observe the Convention must also observe the right to strike for all categories of workers.

A Government member of Germany associated himself completely with the previous speakers as regards the current case. On the other hand, his agreement on the conclusions which the Committee will adopt in this case did not extend to all aspects of the interpretation of the Convention advanced on various sides.

A Workers' member of Italy considered that Kuwait had made insufficient efforts to observe the Convention, although during recent events it promised to democratise and freedom of association was an essential part of this. Failing observance of the Convention, democracy was a long way from being realised. The role of unions was essential for reconstruction of the country on a more just social basis. Prohibition of political activities for unions contradicted their very political participation in liberation of the country. The majority of workers' dependants were migrants and their freedom of association was restricted if such workers could not join unions of their choice. As Kuwait had huge resources, the Government could adopt legislation in conformity with the Convention.

The Government representative emphasised that great progress had been made in his country, which has a legitimate Constitution approved by the people, under a democratic, and not fuedal, Government. General elections are scheduled for October 1992 for the people to choose their representatives in Parliament which will guarantee the legitimacy of the Government. As regards migrant workers, he stated that about half a million foreign workers had come back to Kuwait. Concerning the single trade union system, he indicated that there were several trade unions representing employees not only in banks or industries but also in ministries; foreign workers are also allowed to join these trade unions. He recalled his initial statement that there was no prohibition on affilation to trade unions, and also stated that there were people of 80 different nationalities in the country. Numerous strikes had been organised even in the public sector, and the Government did not intervene to stop these strikes or to arrest representatives of workers for acting in an undisciplined manner. The Government merely called on the two parties to attempt to settle the dispute. Numerous collective agreements had been signed to settle disputes that had been expressed through strikes. As to the role of supervision that the Government undertakes on trade union affairs, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs provides subventions to all representative associations, to trade unions and private voluntary organisations. While the Government supervises the use of this assistance, trade unions have every right to undertake any activities they wish. He declared that the Government would make every effort to submit sufficient information concerning the application of the Convention and to include the revision of the Labour Code amone the priorities in the legislative authorities for reorganising the society of the country.

The Workers' members rather had the impression that legislation in general and more particularly the aspects touching directly or indirectly on the rights of migrant workers do not figure in the priorities of the Government.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It acknowledged the difficulties the Government had been meeting recently, but it felt bound to recall that the subject matter had been a point of concern in the reports of the Committee of Experts for many years and it was disappointed on account of the Government arguing its case referring to a Law dating from 1964, although that Law had been taken fully into account by the Committee of Experts. On the other hand, the Committee was under the impression that progress seems to be made in bringing the legislation in the diretion of full conformity with the Convention. In order that the Committee of Experts can make a full assessment of the situation, the Committee expressed its hope that the Government would send the copy of the draft Labour Code to the ILO and suggested the Government might ask the assistance of the Office in this respect.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). In reply to the Committee's observation, the Government wishes to indicate that the Trade Union Act is the one among the existing labour laws which have now been redrafted to meet the new trends prevailing in this country. With the enactment of these new labour laws, trade union rights will prevail within a new framework.

In addition, a Government representative stated that in July of last year his Government had formed a body composed of nine members named the Central Council for Legislative Studies. This Council will examine laws which need to be repealed or amended, including labour laws. As a result, new labour legislation will be promulgated which reflects the changes occurring in the country, and is in conformity with the Convention. In addition, he stated that in conformity with Declaration No. 11/92 of 24 April 1992, his Government will meet the elected representatives of Parliament to decide on the convocation of a national Convention which will establish the fundamental principles for the drafting of a Constitution that would be the basis for a multi-party democratic system. The new Constitution will incorporate the rights of all workers to form their own independent trade unions in conformity with the democratic system.

The Workers' members stated that they understood that, according to the information provided by the Government representative, Parliament should soon deal with the problems raised by the Committee of Experts and would correct the single trade union monopoly situation. Moreover, they recalled that the Committee had dealt with this problem since 1989. They emphasised that although the Committee of Experts had not received the report, it had taken note of the written information supplied by the Government, as well as the long discussion which had been carried out in the Committee in 1991. At that time the groups were in agreement that the Government needed to take measures to eliminate the trade union monopoly, and to establish the possibility that trade union pluralism could be adopted by granting workers freedom of choice. This did not necessarily mean that the workers must form several trade unions. Neither pluralism nor a single trade union system could be legally imposed, but rather remained a matter of free choice.

The Workers' members stated that they understood that, according to the information provided by the Government representative, Parliament should soon deal with the problems raised by the Committee of Experts and would correct the single trade union monopoly situation. Moreover, they recalled that the Committee had dealt with this problem since 1989. They emphasised that although the Committee of Experts had not received the report, it had taken note of the written information supplied by the Government, as well as the long discussion which had been carried out in the Committee in 1991. This did not necessarily mean that the workers must form several trade unions. Neither pluralism nor a single trade union system could be legally imposed, but rather remained a matter of free choice.

The Employers' members stated that once more they shared the opinion held by the Workers' members. They recalled that the Government had already indicated, during preceding discussions, that the trade union monopoly provided for in the law no longer applied in practice. However, the Workers' members hoped for the official elimination of this legal obligation, as was appropriately requested by the Committee. The Government had indicated that in the light of the political changes that had occurred in the country, the single party system would be eliminated and, as a result, free choice of a trade union system would be introduced. The Workers' members stated that now it was a matter of insisting on the modification of the national legislation. They stated that the written information provided constituted a brief comment on Convention No. 87, which indicated that the text of the relevant Act was being prepared. The implementation of this new legislation would re-establish trade union rights. Nevertheless, in their opinion it was indispensable that the Government provide to the Committee more details on the subject and, above all, the texts of this new Act. Moreover, there remained the question of the date of entry into force of this Act.

A Workers' member of Japan stated that the case of Myanmar was very serious. He recalled long discussions which had taken place on the subject of Myanmar in this Committee last year. Since then, no progress had been made despite the assurance given by the Government representative. In the meantime, the available information on this subject referred to the extreme degree of atrocities and the unprecedented escalation of violations of human rights committed by the military regime. He stated that, according to the statement of the Government representative, the abolition of the single party system had resulted in the end of the single trade union. However, on the basis of available information, he noted that no progress had been made, but rather there had been a change from a State with a single party to a State without any party. In the same manner, there had been a change from a single trade union system to a system characterised by a lack of any trade union. He drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Workers' member of Myanmar did not represent any workers' organisation, which in itself clearly illustrated that there was an absence of a trade union in the country, as well as the total and complete absence of trade union freedom. For these reasons, the case of Myanmar deserved to be included in a special paragraph of the report so that it would draw the attention of the entire Conference as well as of the world.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out to the Committee that the Government representative first had made a statement of denial in respect of Convention No. 29, and then made a statement regarding what it would do in the future in respect of Convention No. 87. However, he reiterated the question already raised by the Employers' members as to when the actions referred to would actually take place.

The Government representative recalled his previous intervention in which he had indicated that the Government was meeting with the elected representatives of all the political parties. He stated that his country was actively committed to a multi-party democracy and market-oriented economy. Measures had been taken to attain this goal, including the guarantee of freedom of association. Democratisation of the country was a long process which required preparation and time. The Government wished to return to a democratic multi-party system because it wanted to have the collaboration of workers and employers who had been granted the right to organise freely. The Government representative recalled that his country was experiencing a period of transition towards democracy, and asked that his Government be given more time to obtain results.

The Workers' members clarified that the availability of the choice of trade union pluralism was an obligation derived from the Convention, that had nothing to do with the political situation. They considered that, taking into account the report of the Committee of Experts and the present discussion, it should demand that the Government take prompt action to correct this situation at the legislative level.

The Committee took due note of the information given by the Government. It understood that the Government was in the process of amending the legislation with a view to lifting the legal restrictions on the freedom of workers to be members of unions of their own choosing. However, it was not clear how far the Government's intentions had materialised in this respect. It therefore strongly urged the Government to bring a Bill to the effect mentioned before Parliament, as soon as possible, and send a copy of the same to the ILO at the same time.

Pakistan (ratification : 1952). A Government representative stated that the Pakistan International Airlines Act had been duly amended and that the right of association of the workers had been restored without any restriction of limitation. As regards the Pakistan Television Corporation, which was referred to as the Telecommunications Corporation, apparently by mistake, in the report of the Committee of Experts, and the Pakistan Broadcasting Corporation, he admitted that the workers did not have the right to form a union, and explained difficulties encountered in the interministerial consultations which involved not only the Ministry of Labour but the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Broadcasting and Information. He stated that this issue was being put before the Cabinet and that the Government was doing its best. As regards the export processing zones, where the workers do not have the right to form a trade union, he stressed that it was a temporary departure from the Convention in view of the economic problems, referring to the following factors : economic scenario of the country facing the pressure of population growth; the need for foreign exchange because of the external debt; economic squeeze of the country; the depression caused by recent events in the Gulf area; the decrease of export commodity price. He emphasised the necessity of measures to earn foreign exchange, which had affected the rights of workers, and the action had been taken in the larger interest of the country as a whole, including workers, who would benefit when the ultimate aim was attained. He also indicated that consultations with the workers and the employers had been made in the Standing Labour Committee. He further referred to some examples of the programme of privatisation, where, although the workers did not have the right to dispute about the Government selling its property, the Government noticed the uneasiness of the workers, carried on negotiations with the workers and arrived at an acceptable agreement, including sale of shares in the units to the workers. He repeated that the departure had been made in the larger interest and that the Government was in the process of consultation with the workers and employers, and hoped that it would soon be in a position to take some measures. As for the granting of trade union rights to senior civil servants, the Government representative declared that only servants in grades 16 to 22, that is in the highest posts, were concerned. These servants have the responsibility of the administration of the State and the capacity to supervise and manage, as well as the right to hire and fire people, and could not be considered as workers. These servants have the right to form their own associations as, for example, District Management Group (DMG) which comprises senior civil servants working in different branches of the Government, inside the country as well as abroad. These associations have to respect certain technical requirements, such as to submit their by-laws, but their members have a right to organise meetings, to present proposals and to discus with the Government. However, if they had trade union rights in the traditional sense, this would pose problems because they are the peole who take the decisions and have no counterpart to discuss them with. Further dialogue with the Committee of Experts would be needed on this point because the Government does not know what rights have been denied to the civil servants which, according to the Committee, are supposed to be given to them. Regarding the schedule of eight public utility services in which strikes are banned, the Experts agreed that most of the services concerned are in fact essential services, but they still considered that some other services named in the report do not fall within this definition. Here we enter into a grey zone which can give rise to different interpretations and, in any case, to a debate. This question of exact delimitation of the public utility services presents obviously great problems in respect of the right to strike. As regards the right of the representation of minority unions, the Government representative pointed out that every trade union will be registered if it comprises 20 per cent of the workers concerned, and the possility to represent workers on a given question is not only reserved to bargaining agents. Also, the management of undertakings is receptive to any request from a group which represents 20 per cent of workers, whether or not it is registered as a trade union. In fact, if one person alone presented a request to the management, he will be listened to. Consequently, no legislative provision prevents a registered trade union, even if it is not the bargaining agent, to present a request to the management in the name of the workers whom it represents. False promotions of certain workers so as to remove them from the category of "workmen" and place them in the "employer" category, thus denying their right to belong to the same union as workers, are really an unfair labour practice. The legislation contains provisions imposing very severe sanctions, including imprisonment, if such practice is proven. The trade unions acting in the multinational enterprises are powerful organisations and present complaints in such cases. Regarding the denial of the right to form trade unions in private and public sector hospitals, the Government representative declared that, even if there exist only associations and not trade unions in the proper sense of the word, they go on strike at the smallest pretext. The Committee of Experts declares only that the employees in hospitals should have the right to form trade unions and negotiate collectively, but the Government has to take into account the total interest of the people in the health sector.

The Workers' members stated that while the report contained the same critical observations as in previous years, the Government seems to be a little more cooperative with the Committee of Experts and this Committee. In fact, the ban on trade union membership and activities for employees of the Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PAIC) was lifted; but, according to the report, it still exists for personnel of the Pakistan Telecommunications Corporation. Apparently there was an error as this ban concerned the employees of the television; the observation of the Committee of Experts need not be changed because the television employees should equally benefit from the rights provided by the Convention. Regarding the denial of the fundamental rights to workers in the export processing zones, the Committee of Experts notes certain evolution, but the situation is still not satisfactory: Convention No. 87 must be applied in a universal manner which does not permit any selective application or any exceptions; the Committee of Experts reminded that the existing restrictions are incompatible with the Convention and should be removed. In what concerns other points mentioned in the report of the Committee, trade union rights of senior civil servants, the rights of representations of minority unions, false promotions to undermine the union membership, the ban of trade union rights for employees in hospitals, the Government has given the same replies as the previous year; it is therefore quite normal that the Committee of Experts repeats that there are points incompatible with convention No. 87. In respect of the right to strike, in particular, the Committee demanded rightfully, in the Workers' opinion, that the Goverment should revise the schedule of services in which strikes are banned. It may be that the Government is facing difficulties in making appropriate modifications in its legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the Convention. It would be useful, perhaps, if it takes recourse to the assistance of the Office, or hosts a direct contacts mission to find a solution to these problems, which have been discussed already for a number of years and forced this Committee to mention Pakistan in a special paragraph in 1987 and 1988.

The Workers' member of Pakistan stated that due to the requests and the pressure of the supervisory bodies the Government had reinstated in their rights the employees of the PIAC. It should do the same in what concerns export processing zones and the radio and television. The workers are conscious of the economic difficulties facing the country but this could not justify, however, the denial of certain fundamental rights. The economic development must be accompanied by social development. Regarding the export processing zones, Convention No. 87 must apply there like in other areas of the country; freedom of association is not a snag to economic development and can even contribute to the social stability through dialogue. Regarding the public utility services, dialogue is necessary on this subject between the Government and the trade unions which recognise the need to take into account the public interest. On the question of false promotious, the speaker stated that even if the workers have the right to engage legal action for unfair labour practice, the State equally carries responsibility in this respect; it should ensure that the enterprises, national as well as multinational, fully respect the law and, for exemple, do not give false promotions to employees on a false pretext in order to impede their union membership. Finally, concerning the situation in hospitals, noting that there should exist a procedure for dispute settlement in this essential service, the speaker stated that workers in this sector should have the right to organise their trade unions under the ordinary legislation on labour relations.

The Employers' members, appreciating the detailed and honest character of the Government representative's declaration, stated that many of these problems might well be solved through the technical assistance of the Office, so that the Government would then fully understand what was required from it. Regarding the export processing zones, the Government representative had referred to the economic difficulties facing the country; none the less, the right to organise was of a fundamental nature and, while understanding the fears of the Government of what might happen once freedom of association was granted, this freedom did not have a direct bearing on the economic difficulties. With respect to the trade union rights of senior civil servants, this was one of the points where ILO technical assistance might well be important. Neither the Committee of Experts nor this Committee had ever drawn a line in terms of the basic rights to freedom of association within the public sector, the only line that had been drawn related to the dispute settlement aspect of collective bargaining situations. It may well be that, even if these rights were provided for senior civil servants, they would not take advantage of them; technical assistance would also be useful in this case. The list of services that the Committee of Experts considered to not be essential contained in paragraph 4 of the report of the Committee of Experts on the right to strike and public utility services perfectly reflected the problems encountered by the employers in view of the narrow definition of essential services adopted by the Committee of Experts to take into account the economic difficulties of the country, its stage of industrial development, as well as other considerations in order to establish the schedule of the essential services. The Government could certainly take advantage of the technical assistance of the ILO on the questions of the rights of minority unions and of bargaining agents. With respect to unfair labour practices in multinational companies, it appeared that there existed in the legislation a recourse procedure, but this Committee did not have any data, for example, the number of the corresponding complaints, of the judgements given, of the delays, etc., to state its opinion in full knowledge of the case. Concerning the right to form trade unions in hospitals, the Employers' members underlined that a distinction should be drawn between the right to organise and the right to strike. It seemed that the Experts agreed with the Government, but also that there were some resemblances to the earlier case of the United Kingdom where the Government feared that the right to organise entails the right to strike. It seemed that in this context a dialogue with the trade unions may result in the kind of stability that the Government was seeking, encouraging it to recognise the right to organise, which was a fundamental aspect of Convention No. 87. The Employers' members, pointing out that this was a complicated case, stated that they saw a lot of good will on the part of the Government and that it should take full advantage of the assistance that may be provided by the ILO.

A Workers' member of Liberia said that the Government representative, admitting that Pakistan was in conflict with the Convention on certain points, invoked as justification the burden of the debt. It was a common problem of a number of countries of the Third World. Workers were never consulted when the money was lent out by the international monetary organisations to their countries but were the first to bear the consequences when the State had to reimburse the debt in question. Workers should not be made to bear the consequences of bad management of international credits provided to a State. Convention No. 87 was unequivocal: workers had a right to form trade unions and, when a government undertook for any reason whatsoever to deny them this right, this was not acceptable.

A Workers' member of Papua New Guinea endorsed comments made previously by the Workers' member of Pakistan. He said that the response given by the Government representative seemed to be influenced by the restrictions imposed on the Third World by the IMF and the World Bank. He was also of the opinion that, independently of their grade in the public administration of any country, senior civil servants should benefit from the right to organise, because they formed part of the total workforce and their efficiency depended to a large extent on the support and cooperation of their subordinates. Also, the workers in public and private hospitals should have the right to form trade unions of their choice. Finally, the economic difficulties should not be invoked by the governments with a view to limiting the rights of workers.

The Government representative indicated that this Government would request the Office for technical assistance concerning the application of the Convention.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government. It felt that the Government's attitude on certain points under consideration seemed to be more positive, moving in the direction of harmonising the legislation with the requirements of the Convention. In view, however, of the long history of the Committee's concern on the points raised by the Committee of Experts, it considered the steps taken so far not to be satisfactory. It welcomed the willingness of the Government to ask the ILO for technical assistance and it therefore hoped that the Government would, within a short time, reconsider its position with a view to changing the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention and report to the ILO on the changes in the near future.

Panama (ratification: 1958). As regards certain points cited in the observation of the Committee of Experts, the Government sends the following documents:

1. Draft Law No. 70 "Providing for the Establishment and regulation of the Civil Service";
2. Resolution No. D.M. 23/92 of 21 May 1992 which reduces the number of documents required for the recognition of social organisations.

In addition, a Government representative, referring to the point in the observation of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention with regard to the exclusion of public servants from the scope of the Labour Code, which is found in Chapters 1 and 2 of Title XI of the Constitution of Panama, indicated that a Bill on administrative careers had been tabled in the Legislative Assembly for study and approval. The Government intended to grant civil servants a legal framework in conformity with the principles of the merit systems as well as other rights and obligations ensuing from constitutional provisions and corresponding to the provisions of the Labour Code which were applicable to the private sector. With regard to the requirement of "an excessively high number of members required to establish trade union organisations" and that of "75 per cent of members of trade unions who were required to be Panamanian" raised by the Committee of Experts in its observation, their potential amendment was likely to be considered in a tripartite debate within the framework of cooperation in the social and labour sectors initiated by the Government. This consultation and the subworking groups that had been set up within it formed an appropriate framework to improve the Labour Code in conformity with ratified international labour Conventions. This measure was also intended to improve national production and the general conditions of workers and employers as well as to improve the possibilities to create new sources of employment. The question of "the automatic removal from office of a trade union officer in the event of his dismissal" was also being discussed within the framework of the cooperation process. This removal applies only to the leaders of unions at the enterprise-level, who must be employed at the enterprise. The removal does not apply to the sectoral unions, federations, confederations or trade union centres. As regarded the authorities' wide powers of supervision over the records of accounts of trade unions, it would be appropriate to point out that Resolution No. 23/92 of 21 May 1992, which reduced the number of documents which were necessary for the recognition and functioning of social organisations, restricted and regulated in an appropriate manner section 376, subsection 4, of the Labour Code, to take account of the previous observations of the Committee of Experts.

As concerned the observations on Act No. 13 of 11 October 1990, it was important to emphasise the temporary and exceptional nature of this measure which was justified by a stabilisation policy to bring about economic recovery. This Act had not prevented the negotiation of six collective agreements in 1990 nor the adoption of nine other collective agreements through direct negotiations in 1991. Moreover, it had not prevented strikes but had simply introduced arbitration after consultation with workers to prevent the closure of the enterprise and the loss of employment in the case of prolonged strikes. Act No. 13 had to be re-examined within the framework of the labour management consultation process in order to rapidly re-establish the exercise of collective bargaining in conformity with international labour Conventions. As for the Public Order Act No. 25 of 14 December 1990, its provisions ceased to be in force on 31 December 1991. It had not been established that "an important number" of workers had been dismissed: that Act only affected public employees who had commited acts of violence towards other public employees or consumers of public services and who had damaged the installations and property of the State in non-union activities, as was the case of two public enterprises, and not because they were trade union leaders. However, the number of workers who had been dismissed only represented 2.3 per cent of the employees in each of these two enterprises. Numerous dismissed workers 107, in the Water and Electricity Institute (IRHE) and 37 in the National Telecommunications Institute (INTEL), had appealed before the competent courts which paved the way for full jurisdiction administrative proceedings which had to be settled by the appropriate chamber of the Supreme Court. Detailed information in this respect had been submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1569) and in the supplementary reports on Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 presented in January 1992.

The Workers' members stated that the Conference had examined this case in 1981, in 1988 and in 1991. The long examination that had taken place the previous year had led to a conclusion which was put in a special paragraph of its report. Other than the points that were already well known, the Committtee of Experts also noted this year that more recent laws contained restrictions on the right to strike and provided for anti-union measures against public servants. The situation in law and in practice did not seem to have changed from last year. The only new element consisted in the "agreement on cooperation in the social and labour sectors" concluded between employers, workers and the Government in December 1991, which should allow for the beginning of consultations which would lead to an eventual amendment of Act No. 13 of 1990, restricting the right to strike. The content of the texts mentioned in the written communication by the Government appeared to be obscure. However, a slight change in the Government's attitude was noticeable in that it seemed to be more positive this year than during the debates that took place in 1991. The Government – as indeed certain other governments notably in Latin America – gave the impression of wishing to comply more with the supervisory bodies. This intention of the Government to proceed with certain changes had not resulted in any real progress in practice. It would also be appropriate to insist that the initiatives annouced result in an actual amendement of the legislation on all the points raised by the Committee of Experts for many years, notably on the elimination of state intervention in trade union internal affairs, the elimination of the requirement with regard to nationality, the guarantee of freedom of association of workers in the public sector and the respect of the right to strike. In view of the seriousness of these issues which had been emphasised in the Committee's conclusions of 1991 and having regard to the complexity of the information provided by the Government, a direct contacts mission from the ILO could be envisaged. In the absence of a change in the near future, not only in the intentions of the Government but also in reality, this Committee would be forced to note once again next year the discrepancies between stated intentions and actions.

The Employers' members indicated that their point of view differed from that of the Workers' members on a number of points. Concerning the substantive issues raised in this case, it was first of all clear that the denial of the right of public servants to bargain collectively constituted a flagrant violation of the Convention. The information on their legal situation contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and in the Declaration of the Government representative was however somewhat confusing and it would be appropriate if the Experts examined this question attentively once again. To know if the requirement of a minimum number of 50 workers or of ten employers to establish an organisation was too high, one could wonder what in fact was the right figue: the Committee of Experts found it to be too high, the Government promised to modify it but however the Convention did not say anything on this matter. One should therefore be careful in prescribing specific figures which in any case could only be arbitrary. On the other hand, concerning the requirement that 75 per cent of trade union members should be Panamanian, it was undeniable that there was a clear infringement of the Convention which guarantees right to freedom of association without any considerations of nationality. The Government stated that this issue was going to be examined and one would hope that this examination would have a positive outcome. As to the problem of the extensive supervisory powers of the authorities on trade union activities, it was important to distinguish between those powers that could lead to a real interference in the internal affairs of the union and the simple verification of accounts which according to the Government were intended to prevent or punish abuse. The Committee of Experts itself recognised that there could be an audit if a request was made by a tribunal or by the majority of union members. Union members indeed had to be protected against potential abuse and it would be appropriate if minorities could also benefit from this protection. With regard to restrictions on the right to strike, the agreement concluded in December 1991 between the social partners and the Government constituted a new and important element. Last year the Employers' members had already expressed their views on the way in which the right to strike had been interpreted by the Committee of Experts. The Experts, however, did not take into account the new agreement or the views of the Employers' members who had nevertheless explained in detail the reasons for which the principles relating to the interpretation of the Committee of Experts were not acceptable to them. The Committee of Experts which in paragraph 6 of its General Report said that it followed the "spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility" in respect of its relations with this Committee had however in the present case reiterated its previous stance without adducing additional arguments. In short the Employers' members were in complete agreement with the Committee of Experts as to the extreme gravity of this case, but were in complete disagreement as to certain elements of its analysis.

The Workers' member from Panama stated that he shared the views expressed by the Committee of Experts in its observation on the application of the Convention. The cooperation process that had taken place had led to the hope that the problems that were identified would be resolved. With regard to the questions examined by the the Committee of Experts, although Act No. 13 had been adopted in exceptional circumstances, its application had been unilateral. A large number of workers had been dismissed pursuant to Act No. 25 and the recommendations formulated in that respect by the Committee on Freedom of Association should be followed. In spite of his support for the consultation process and his optimism as to its outcome, which should overcome the problems in time for the following year's meeting of this Committee, the speaker felt that it would be appropriate to continue to examine this case. The ILO could assist in the revision of the labour legislation in force.

The Government representative indicated that some of the points examined by the Committee of Experts had been suspended for a number of years but that the situation had been aggravated by the provisions introduced in 1990 because of the exceptional events that had taken place in his country. The Government had the firm intention of finding a solution to all the problems raised by the Committee of Experts. The consultation process constituted a particularly appropriate framework to examine these questions through dialogue between the Government and employers' and workers' organisations. This dialogue did not only cover Act No. 13 but had the aim of revising the whole of the Labour Code. Reiterating his previous declarations, the Government representative communicated information related to collective agreements that had been negotiated after the entry into force of Act No. 13.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government from which it understood that a tripartite consultation process had been started with a view to ensuring that the legislation was brought into complete conformity with the requirements of the Convention. At the same time, the Committee had the impression that the progress made so far was still limited. In view of the fact that the political situation in the country had changed dramatically only a few years ago and that the new Government found itself confronted with problems on the subject matter, the Committee suggested to the Government to invite a direct contacts mission from the ILO in order to reach the aforementioned goal in the near future.

Paraguay (ratification: 1962). The Government communicated the following information:

The situation resulting from the application of Act No. 200/70 which does not allow public servants to organise and denies them the right to strike will be rectified. The regulation made under Act No. 200/70 is going to disappear. In this regard, the Government adopted Decree No. 3210/89 of 17 October 1989 signed by the President of the Republic which names the director-general of the public service workers and under section 2 provides: "The general directorate of public service workers, besides the special duties attributed to it under the law, will elaborate a revised, updated draft of Act No. 200/70 to be presented to the National Parliament."

At present, for procedural reasons based on the principle of legal supremacy, the Government hopes that once the new Constitution is adopted and promulgated in the near future, the new Act on the public service will be submitted to Parliament and that it will be in conformity with the contents of the new Charter.

Furthermore, it should be pointed out that the draft Constitution has overcome these inconveniences. Chapter 8 concerning labour (first section), in respect of labour rights provides, in section 96: "All workers, whether in the public service of in the private sector, have the right to organise trade unions without prior authorisation." Only the members of the armed forces and the police are excluded from this right. The employers also benefit from the right to organise. No one can be required to join a trade union. A trade union will be recognised and will be able to function as long as it has registered with the relevant administrative body. The democratic practice established in the Act will determine the election of the leaders and the functioning of the unions. The Act will also guarantee immunity to trade union leaders.

The Government adds that all workers in the public service and in the private sector have the right to strike in cases of conflict of interest.

The employers have the right to lockout in the same conditions. The Act regulates the exercises of this right so that the essential public services are not affected.

Article 288 of the draft Labour Code provides, in its last paragraph, that the right to organise extends to civil servants and workers in the public sector, in conformity with section 2 of the draft which provides that civil servants of the central administration, with respect to this right, will be regulated by a special Act, from which it can be deduced that they will be submitted to the provisions of the Code and that only members of the armed forces and the polices will be excluded.

With respect to the other comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government assures that the draft Labour Code provides for the adaptation of national law to international Conventions and the abrogation of all laws which restrict, suppress, or attack the victories obtained at the international level concerning labour issues.

Thus, with respect to standards concerning strikes, those which are contained in the present Labour Code, such as sections 285, 353 and 360, as well as section 284 et suite of the Code of Labour Procedure, which have been criticised by the ILO, have been eliminated.

The Government has attached copies of the draft national consitution, the articles of which have been approved until 20 April 1992, as well as Decree No. 3210 of 17 October 1989.

In addition, a Government representative, the Vice-Minister of Labour, pointed out that, with respect to Act No. 200 and the recognition of the right to organise and collective bargaining of workers in public enterprises and public services, the new Decree No. 3210 stipulated that the General Direction of Public Servants was to elaborate a draft updating the above-mentioned Act. This demonstrated the will of the Government to amend national legislation. The new Constitution included fundamental changes concerning labour rights; in particular, the following: the right to work; the promotion by the State of policies to ensure full employment; the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of age, social conditions, sex, religion, political preference; equality in employment for men and women; regulation of the work of young persons; maternity leave; and hours of work per day and per week. Furthermore, he noted that there were provisions concerning wages and the creation of an incentive scheme for companies which provided additional benefits to workers. The new Consititution provided also for the resolution of collective disputes, social security benefits and provisions concerning freedom of association. In particular, workers in both the private and public sector had the right to organise trade unions without prior authorisation with the exception of members of the police and the armed forces. Furthermore, the new Constitution would provide trade unions with the right to bargain collectively, to have voluntary recourse to arbitration and, for workers in both the private and public sector, the right to strike in the case of a collective dispute. Finally , a section of the new Constitution concerning the public service provided for the following: all Paraguayans have the right to employment in the public service and shall benefit from the guarantees provided for by this Constitution on equal terms with workers in the private sector. With the promulgation of this new Constitution on 12 June 1992, the provisions which were in contradiction with ratified Conventions would be considerably amended.

The Workers' members noted that this was the first time this Committee had had the opportunity to discuss this case due to the absence of the Government of Paraguay in previous years. They noted that trade unions and their activities had been so regulated that the trade union movement had been truly suffocated. Trade union activity was completely prohibited in the public sector. They noted that the information provided by the Government both orally and in writting indicated that the national legislation would be amended in order to bring it into line with international standards and, in particular, with this Convention. The Government had requested ILO technical assistance for the elaboration of a draft Bill on freedom of association. There was, therefore, insufficient information available at present to permit a close examination of the application of this Convention. They stressed, however, that real progress could be noted, however, if the Government were to adopt in the near future, and implement, the draft legislation. They urged the Government to take this action soon and to communicate all relevant information, including any texts adopted and to indicate the measures envisaged for the practical application of the legislation.

The Employers' members noted that the information available was not sufficient to permit in-depth examination of this case. They welcomed, however, the indication that the new Constitution addressing several questions raised by the Committee of Experts would be adopted on 12 June 1992. Still they noted that specific details concerning the draft legislation had not been provided and urged the Government to send a copy of the draft to the Office to permit an evaluation of its conformity with the Convention. In particular, they pointed out that the legislation presently in force required approval by three-quarters of trade union membership to call a strike. This requirement was probably too high but since strikes affect the society the Government had a right to set a requirement at a lower level. Furthermore, the Committee of Experts had identified a number of services which were not granted the right to strike and which it did not consider to be essential services. As the Convention did not specifically mention the right to strike, they felt that the definition of an essential service may depend on the size of the country, the state of its economy, etc., and accordingly may differ as between countries. The Government's statement was encouraging but, once again, words must be followed by deeds.

The Workers' member of Paraguay noted that the statement made by the Government representative with respect to the new provisions concerning social questions introduced in the new Constitution was accurate both in respect of freedom of association in the public and private sector and with respect to the right to strike. He stated that these new provisions met with the satisfaction of the workers and he expressed the hope that they would soon be adopted. Nevertheless, he explained that three major trade union organisations had requested that the draft Labour Code be held in suspense until the new Constitution was adopted, thus ensuring a number of fundamental rights. He expressed concern, however, that some sectors might try to change some of the essential elements of the new Constitution. He indicated the need for the Government to keep the ILO well informed in this regard. Concern was also expressed for the approach taken by the employers of the country with respect to freedom of association, collective bargaining and other workers' rights. He was concerned that the Minister of Justice and Labour might not possess the authority necessary to defend the rights of the workers when they were faced with an employers' sector which still did not understand that Paraguay could only find peace based upon respect for all the sectors of the economy, including the working classes. Finally, he expressed the hope that the new Goverment would be able to comply with international labour standards.

The Government representative, in reply to the questions raised by the Workers' member, recalled that these were times of change in Paraguay, both of an institutional and a legal nature, and that this change affected all groups of society. As concerns the alleged weakness and absence of authority of the Ministry of Labour, he stated his belief that the strength of an institution did not depend on power relative to the institution but rather on the standards which were laid down to enable the institution to ensure the respect of the rights of both workers and employers. The speaker requested ILO technical assistance to verify that the new standards adopted were in conformity with the Conventions and to assist in finding solutions to the problems remaining in the legislation.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the concerns raised and the statement made by the Workers' member of Paraguay concerning the guarantees necessary for true freedom of association. These elements were clearly essential to the democratisation process.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the regional adviser on standards would undertake a mission to his country to provide the necessary technical assistance to complete the legislative process being undertaken there and would take into account, in particular, ILO standards relating to freedom of association.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government that the legislation was being changed. It stressed the importance of freedom of association and strongly expressed its hope that the Government would be able to report in the very near future that the necessary changes had been made. It therefore requested the Government to send all relevant documents to the ILO as soon as possible.

Syrian Arab Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative first referred to Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968 on trade unions, which should have been in conformity with the Convention. In consultation with the General Federation of Workers' Unions a draft Legislative Decree had been prepared to amend Legislative Decree No. 84 taking into account the observations of the Committee of Experts. This draft was sent to the Council of Ministers on 28 May 1992. The amendments proposed in the draft provided that: (1) each trade union shall be governed by its own statutes without any requirement that they correspond to the model established by the Federation, to attain its objectives in accordance with its own financial resources; (2) the prior agreement of the Federation and the Ministry of Labour in order to accept donations shall not be necessary (section 32 of Legislative Decree No 84); (3) the provision which restricted the independence of management and the free administration of trade unions shall be repealed (section 35 of Legislative Decree No. 84); (4) the provision which permitted the dissolution of any trade union which did not observe the provisions of Legislative Decree No. 84 shall be repealed. Paragraph 4 of section 44 of Legislative Decree No. 84, which required a member to be engaged in a related occupation for six months before being eligible trade union office, was repealed. In respect of section 25 of Legislative Decree No. 84 which required that, in order to become a trade union member, non-Arab foreign workers must have been resident for one year in Syria and be from a country that had reciprocal provisions, he stated that the condition of reciprocity was repealed as Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1980 had already eliminated the residency condition. Decree No. 30 was sent in due time to the ILO. In reference to Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969 on associations of craftsmen, the Government representative stated that it had indicated to these associations that it was necessary for them to amend their statutes, and that it had requested information about the application of the Convention . The Government will supply to the Office any information that it receives. In referring to the single trade union system, he indicated that in his country trade union pluralism existed, which was evident from the reference in Legislative Decree No. 84 to different trade unions, which was also the case in Act No. 21 regarding peasants' associations. In these texts, reference was made to different types of associations (teachers, automobile salesmen, retailers) which dealt directly with employers. Each organisation had its own statutes, and for this reason he did not understand how one could speak about a single trade union system. The law authorised the creation of associations in each sector and occupational field, which participated fully in the decision-making process through their representations at the highest levels of the State. The percentage of workers and agricultural workers represented in Parliament was very high. Due to the divergence in interpretation between the Government and the Committee of Experts, the Government would contemplate appeal to the tribunal mentioned in its statement during the general discussion. Finally, he indicated that the draft contemplated the repeal of section 160 of the Labour Code of 1958, which prohibited strikes in the agricultural sector.

The Workers' members noted that the Committee of Experts had made comments for several years about the application of the Convention and that, even if the present case had not been dealt with in the recent past, it concerned a very serious problem. In the report supplied to the Committee of Experts a tripartite committee was referred to, responsible for giving advice on certain legislative matters in order to place it in conformity with international labour standards. However, it was the sole trade union, the General Federation of Workers' Unions, that provided such opinions, which concerned a limited number of questions. In effect, they did not involve the elimination of the single trade union system that was expressly provided for in the law, the extensive powers of the authorities to intervene in trade union finances, nor the restrictions on trade union rights of non-Arab foreign workers. In respect of the draft Legislative Decree seeking to remove the total prohibition of strikes in the agricultural sector, the information supplied in the Government report was very limited and of a general nature. The Workers' members emphasised the importance of freedom of association as an essential condition for the development of a dynamic and responsible trade union movement. Regarding the restrictions on the freedom of association of non-Arab foreign workers, they referred to the position that they had held during the general debate concerning Convention No. 111. In effect, it involved an open and express discrimination which might have negative repercussions on the fundamental rights of migrant workers, particularly in respect of Conventions Nos. 95 and 96. They considered that one of the principal problems concerned the lack of complete information on questions raised by the Committee of Experts. They drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Syrian Arab Republic was among those countries which had for at least three years not responded, or had responded in an insufficient manner, to the requests of the Experts. As a result the information concerning the work of the tripartite committee as a consultative body, to which the Government representative alluded, was very vague. Finally, the Workers' members stressed that the Government should strengthen its collaboration with the ILO and the supervisory bodies. In effect, specific details concerning the new draft Legislative Decree were necessary. They stated that they would continue to follow closely the evolution of the situation in order to be able to verify whether the legislation and national practice had been changed to conform with the Convention.

The Employers' members noted that the Government representative had raised three matters. Firstly, the changes that the Government wished to initiate gave the impression that the Government wanted to meet all the comments made by the Experts. Secondly, the representative not understand the discrepancies raised by the Committee of Experts. Thirdly, in response to the comment that trade union pluralism was lacking, the Government representative insisted that there was no need for any change in this regard because there already was pluralism in the trade union movement. The Employers' members had difficulty reconciling the statements of the Government representative. In response to the Government representative's suggestion that the Experts had not referred to positive changes brought about by the Government, they noted that in 1990 there was no report available and therefore they were unable to discuss the matter. When the Government was invited to provide information as to why it was not fulfilling its reporting obligations, the Government representative had responded that a new draft Legislative Decree was before Parliament and that a number of changes to labour legislation were being made. However, it was clear that no progress had been made since then. This case had been the subject of comment by the Committee of Experts' for more than ten years, and the Committee during the past ten years had dealt with the case at least six times. As mentioned by the Workers' members, there was a clear discrepancy between the national legislation and practice and the requirements of the Convention, in particular with regard to the question of the single trade union system. The Convention did not specify that there must be pluralism or that there must be a single trade union system; it only provided that pluralism must be possible. However, a decree of the Syrian Arab Republic referred in name to the central trade union organisation, and this amounted to a clear violation of the Convention. They stated that the issues concerning restrictions on trade union rights and governmental interference in trade union finances seemed to be clear, but they had serious reservations in respect of the right to strike in the agricultural sector. They noted that according to the criteria of the Committee of Experts, the feeding of the population could be an essential service, particularly during certain periods of the year, and strikes therefore could have catastrophic effects, particularly in developing countries. They did not pursue this point further, because of their belief that the details of the right to strike or to carry out trade union activities were a matter for national legislation. It was stressed that it was essential and urgent for the Government to submit a complete report covering all the points raised by the Committee of Experts, and most importantly, to indicate what would and what would not be changed. They expressed regret that there continued to exist a discrepancy between the requirements of the Convention and the law and practice in Syria, and requested that changes be undertaken as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic recalled that the report of the Committee of Experts requested that the Government indicate whether the opinion of the General Federation of Workers' Unions was for or against the repeal of certain legislative texts. He noted that the situation in respect of the protection of the right to freedom of association was sound and that trade unions enjoyed the full right to this freedom, as well as other recognised rights. In addition, they participated in social and political decision-making and contributed in this way to guaranteeing and ensuring social peace. He indicated that 50 per cent of the Members of Parliament were representatives of workers and peasant farmers. Moreover, trade unions were represented in the production councils of enterprises and workers, and agricultural workers and craftsmen were represented on the Justice Committee. In addition, Legisative Decree No. 157 provided that workers were represented on the Social Security Council and the Economic, Health and Environment Committee. He also stressed that every worker was entirely free, pursuant to sections 48 and 49 of the Constitution of the Syrian Arab Republic, to form and to join associations and trade unions as well as to administer their own affairs. Trade union organisations in the Syrian Arab Republic are proud of the fact that they have been freely constituted; their leaders freely elected, and their rules, methods of functioning and commitment to freedom of association plurality self-established.

A Workers' member of the United Kingdom raised two points. Firstly, in addressing the question of pluralism, he stated that he did not object to a trade union movement choosing to form a single trade union or trade union struture, as is the case in many countries. However, it was unacceptable that such a situation be enshrined in legislation, even if this is asked for or agreed to by the trade unions. He asked whether the Government had removed from its legislation all references to a single trade union as requested, as an answer to this question would assist further examination of the matter. Secondly, he raised the issue of restrictions on strikes in the agricultural sector. While acknowledging that there were reservations by some employers about this matter, he stressed that as a rule a piece of legislation that denies a whole sector of the population the right to strike must be contrary to the Convention. He noted that arising from alleged human rights abuses in 1980 a strike was organised by the Doctors and Engineers' Association following which 100 medical professionals, dentists and veterinarians were arrested and imprisoned without trial; some of these persons were still in prison. As an example, he referred to a case brought to his attention by the Trade Union Section of Amnesty International, that of Dr. Tawfig Drag al-Siba'i who had been arrested at that time and remained in a military prison in Damascus without trial. It may be argued that such a strike at that time was illegal; but whether such strikes were illegal or not under the terms of Convention No. 87 was a matter for the Committee of Experts to decide having had their attention brought to them.

The Government representative stated that the last point raised by the Workers' member of the United Kingdom was not a matter for discussion. The discussion should be confined to the subject of the repeal of the ban on strikes, section 160 of the Labour Code of 1958, concerning which the Government informed the ILO that there was a new draft legislation to repeal this section, which implies that the Committee cannot examine section 160 itself.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom reminded the Committee of the statement he had made during the General Discussion during which he had indicated that that the best contribution which the ILO and the Committee could make to the UN Conference on Human Rights in 1993 was to ensure that no abuse of the human rights of trade unions would go unnoticed or uncondemned. Another Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic indicated that he shared the same opinion as the Government representative in respect of the compatibility of Decree No. 84 with Convention No. 87, particularly concerning consultation with the General Federation of Workers' Unions. He stated that he had personally participated in some of these consultations where numerous matters had been addressed. For the purpose of these consultations it had been agreed that he would send a draft of the legislative decree to the Council of Ministers. He pointed out that the assertions of the speaker for the Workers' members and of the Worker member of the United Kingdom had no basis. He noted the history of the trade union movement in his country, where there were 2,500 trade union committees in all the provinces, and emphasised the importance of their activities.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 established universal values, the right to organise and bargain collectively. However, these universal values would be meaningless if interpreted differently by different countries. If there was to be flexibility in ILO labour standards, this flexibility must be found within the four corners of the instrument in question.

The Government representative stated that he wished that the debate had concentrated on the single area of disagreement, which was the single trade union system, as all the other points had been responded to, as the draft Legislative Decree that he had referred to – which had been communicated to the Office – had met all the observations of the Committee of Experts. He reiterated that in his country a single trade union did not exist. He had hoped that the statement of the Workers' member of the United Kingdom would be confined to examination of the observation concerning the single trade union system; instead, the matter of section 160 concerning strikes in the agricultural sector was raised – despite the fact that the Government has stated several times that there is a new draft amendment to repeal section 160. This amendment could not be instantly promulgated as if by magic; established channels needed to be followed. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom used section 160 to address old alleged strikes and to criticise his Government, deviating from the established practice and the comments to which he should have confined himself. the Employers' members said that the Government criticised the Committee of Experts; is it criticism to call attention to the fact that ten years after the repeal of the condition of one year residence for non-Arabic foreign workers for the right to join a trade union (repealed by Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982), the Committee of Experts continues to call for its repeal? The Government representative stated that his Government wished to cooperate with the ILO and was, in fact, doing so. The Government wished to discuss and dialogue with the workers and employers.

The Workers' members stated that they had taken note of the intention of the Government to fully cooperate with the ILO and the present Committee. Nevertheless, they stressed that problems concerning the application of the Convention persisted, but that, in order to be able to continue the debates, it was absolutely indispensable that the reports containing the requested replies to the observations of the Committee of Experts be supplied on time. They considered the statements of the Government to be at first glance encouraging, but they could not satisfy themselves solely with oral statements. They were obliged to base their examination of the matter on the reports of the Committee of Experts, which were usually based on data and information that had been supplied on time.

The Employers' members reiterated their request that the Government provide a comprehensive written report. They also wished to know when the legislation referred to by the Government representative would be implemented and enter into force. Although they had stated that there could be differences of opinion regarding the scope of the right to strike, they stressed that there were no differences in respect of the freedom of association. The right to form and join a trade union of one's own choice must be ongoing and guaranteed. They wondered why the Government had not removed reference in its legislation to a single trade union organisation, if there really were different trade unions within the country.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government. It understood that a Bill which intends to change the labour legislation under discussion has very recently been drafted and presented to the Council of Ministers. Recalling that it has been discussing these points for some years, it felt that it was necessary that the Bill which the Government referred to be studied carefully by the Committee of Experts at its next session. It understood that the Government will cooperate fully with the competent bodies of the ILO, and send therefore all the relevant documents. It hoped to be able to conclude at one of its next sessions that the situation is in complete conformity with the Convention.

United Kingdom (ratification : 1949). A Government representative addressed the comments raised in the Committee of Experts' report concerning the complexity of the legislation. He indicated that he would address the general concerns raised and that his Government would provide more detailed information on specific points in its next report on this Convention. He stated that the aim of the legislative changes taking place in his country over recent years was to establish a proper balance between the rights of trade unions and employers and between trade unions and their members. These changes had been extensively debated and therefore had come about as the result of the democratic process. He affirmed his Government's position that the legislation in question was in full compliance with the provisions of the Convention and that there has been no regulation of the freedom of workers to organise their own trade unions or to adopt their own rules and determine the manner in which their union affairs would be conducted. The legislation, furthermore, provided special protection against legal proceedings which might otherwise be brought against trade unions calling on workers to break contracts in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute and in no way infringed upon the worker's right to take part in industrial action. The widely supported amended legislation was intended to protect the rights of individual trade union members by ensuring that they were properly consulted prior to a call for industrial action. As concerns the complexity of its legislation, the Government had made efforts to ensure that clear guidance was available by publishing a series of free up-to-date booklets explaining the legislation as it applied to employers, workers and trade unions. Furthermore, the Government intended to bring all the legislation together into a single consolidated Act. New measures had been introduced in this regard since the recent elections. He concluded by assuring the Conference Committee that the Government would supply full information concerning the progress of this legislation.

The Workers' members welcomed the statement made by the Government representative that a consolidation of legislative texts concerning labour issues would be made shortly. Nevertheless, they stressed that information from the British Trades Union Congress indicated that the overall legislation had become not only too complex but also oppressive. Even if the trade unions of some countries felt that they could not function without detailed legislation regulating their rights, British trade unions were of a contrary opinion. In fact, simply considering the number of legislative texts and their complexity, the legislation was oppressive. Furthermore, some of this legislation considerably impeded the activities of the trade union movement. The situation had come to a point where the ordinary trade union delegate no longer understood the legislation and was therefore tempted to curtail participation in trade union activities to the detriment of the movement. Whilst there would always be men and women willing to dedicate all their time, indeed their whole lives to the trade union movement, many in some parts of the world had died for the movement. It ordinary members were detered from taking an active role at a local level fear of contravening the law this would be a great loss to responsible trade unionism. As concerns the consolidation of the legislative texts into one Act, they stated that, according to the information they had, the Government was also going to adopt other laws concerning trade unionism. Given that trade unions could not request the Government to introduce legislative amendments at the same time that the consolidation was being considered, they requested the Government to pause for a moment and to consult with the trade unions in order to review the provisions which could be eliminated not only from the new Acts but also from those which had already been adopted so that all of the legislation would be in conformity with the Convention. This would permit a more in-depth examination of the entire legislation later on.

The Employers' members expressed a certain discomfort with respect to the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the volume and the complexity of the legislation. The Committee of Experts had perhaps condemned the Government too rapidly by, for example, noting an incompatibility with the Convention and then requesting full information in order to determine if there was a violation. As concerns more specifically the volume and the complexity of the legislation, the Employers' members, stressing that there was no Convention providing that national law had to be simple, feared that the Committee of Experts used subjective criteria. In an ideal world laws would always be simple and everyone would subscribe to them. Unfortunately, this situation was much more complicated, particularly for historical reasons and laws naturally had a tendency to become more complex. It appeared that the Committee of Experts had concluded that one or two provisions could be interpreted in such a way that there could be a violation of the Convention. Nevertheless, practically all provisions of national law everywhere could be interpreted in this manner, as the criteria was so large that it opened the door to abusive interpretations. If provisions were to be criticised, it should be done in a concrete fashion. The criticism made by the Committee of Experts concerning the complexity of legislation was not a valid reproach to be made against a country. It would be better to cite a specific provision which was in violation of a certain Convention. This was the only rational approach. As concerns the measures taken by the Government to consolidate legislative texts, the Conference Committee would have to wait for the texts in order to undertake a detailed examination.

The Government representative assured the Committee that it would convey these comments to his Government. He had noted that this issue of complexity of legislation had to be seen taking into account the needs of the ordinary workers and their trade union representatives and he stressed that most of the laws on this subject dated back 20 years. The Government would supply in its next report on this Convention the supplementary information requested by the Committee of Experts which permit further review of this question next year.

The Government representative, with respect to the situation at the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ), recalled that his Government had explained in some detail in previous discussions in this Committee its reasons for maintaining that there was no substantive case to be answered. He reiterated three main points maintained by his Government concerning this case: (1) GCHQ staff were engaged in vital intelligence gathering and communications activities which formed part of the United Kingdom's national security and were therefore covered by the provisions of Convention No. 151 which allowed exemption from the right of association for public servants who were engaged in work of a confidential nature. (2) This case related solely to one establishment. Furthermore, similar establishments in other ILO member States were generally staffed by military personnel and thus excluded from the provisions of Convention No. 87. (3) While GCHQ employees may not belong to national trade unions, they are free to organise in a trade union based on the workplace called the Government Communications Staff Federation. This Federation, which is registered as a trade union under the appropriate legal provisions of the United Kingdom, had in its membership more than half the present employees at GCHQ and represented them both individually and collectively in negotiations over pay, conditions of service and a wide range of other issues. It is clear, therefore, that employees at GCHQ did retain the right to trade union membership and representation.

Last year, the Conference Committee concluded that, despite the substantial difference between the views of the Government and those of the unions on trade union representation at GCHQ, the Government should reopen dialogue with the unions with a view to finding a solution in full conformity with the Convention. Prior to last year's Conference there had been no discussions on this issue between the Government and the trade unions for over six years. The Government representative informed the Committee, however, that as a result of its conclusions last year, a dialogue had begun. The Prime Minister wrote to the General Secretary of the Trades Union Congress on 25 June 1991, setting out the Government's views on the matter, but at the same time offering the unions the opportunity to discuss union representation at GCHQ with the Head of the Home Civil Service during one of their regular meetings with him. The Prime Minister wrote again on 20 December 1991 reiterating this offer. This information was provided to the Committee of Experts at the end of 1991. These letters led to a resumption of dialogue. On 18 February 1992, a special meeting was held to discuss the GCHQ issues between the Head of the Home Civil Service and the general secretaries of all the civil service trade unions. This meeting did not result in an agreement on how the substantial differences remaining between the parties might be resolved. The issues were indeed difficult and highly sensitive, affecting national security. The Government had made clear, however, at that meeting and subsequently in a letter to the Secretary of the Council of Civil Service Unions, dated 24 February 1992, that despite these differences, the Government remained willing to consider any new proposals the unions might wish to put forward. The Government concluded its letter by noting that there was still a fundamental incomptability between the propositions of the two sides which could not be easily resolved. It indicated, however, its willingness to consider any new proposals the unions may wish to make which would guarantee the Government the absence of any disruption to essential security operations. The Government had, therefore, responded at the most senior level to the conclusions concerning GCHQ reached by this Committee in 1991 and the dialogue remained open. While he noted that the Workers' members might maintain that this meeting merely demonstrated that there was no room to propose arrangements which would be acceptable to the Government, the Government representative recalled that it was acknowledged in this Committee's debate in 1991 that the differences between the two sides would not be easy to resolve and neither the Government nor the unions could be excepted to find a complete solution easily or quickly. The activities at GCHQ involved essential operations of national security and the Government had to be fully satisfied that these would be safeguarded from any form of disruption. It might not be possible to bridge the substantial gap between the Government and the civil service trade unions, nevertheless, the Government was ready to discuss any proposals that could offer the necessary guarantees. Such proposals would be considered fully and fairly on their merits. The criticisms made of the United Kingdom at the 1991 Conference and contained within the Committee of Experts' latest comments had produced a response from the Government. Careful note had been taken of the supervisory bodies' comments. The Government was willing to continue this dialogue in an attempt to reconcile the differences between the two parties and would consider any constructive suggestions to this end. He urged the Conference Committee to accept the action taken to reopen dialogue with the unions as a step forward and to support its continuation.

The Workers' member of the United States spoke on behalf of the Workers' members. They expressed their dismay at the inaction on the part of the Government following the lengthy discussions on this case last year in this Committee and the unanimous conclusion it reached urging the Government to undertake remedial action in the shortest possible time. The substantive points of the case had already been settled last year and did not need to be repeated. In 1991, the Conference Committee had expressed its deep concern at the lack of dialogue between the Government and the trade unions at GCHQ concerning the ban of their right to join unions of their choice. This Committee urged the Government to reconsider its position by promptly resuming the dialogue with a view to finding a solution in full conformity with the Convention and requested the Government to report in 1992 to the Office on the real and substantial progress made. Unfortunately, no progress could be noted. The Committee of Experts' report indicated that the Government had reaffirmed its belief that its actions in respect of GCHQ were in line with its obligations under ILO Conventions. The Committee of Experts further noted that they had not been provided with any new element to lead them to modify their previous observations on the merits of the case and urged the Government to resume in the every near future constructive discussions calculated to lead, through genuine dialogue, to compromise acceptable to both sides. They considered that the meeting held between the Government and trade union representatives was merely a facade and did not constitute a genuine constructive dialogue which would lead to reconsideration of the Government's position or a compromise acceptable to both sides as intended by the Committee of Experts and by this Committee. They believed that it was clear that the Government had no intention to consider any arrangements or proposals involving representation by free trade unions. It, therefore, appeared that the Government wished to be ruled by a different standard than those governing other member States which had ratified the Convention. They hoped that the Government representative would convey to his Government the Workers' members' desire for real movement in this case. The attitude taken by the Government, in sharp contradiction with its long history of enlightenment and dedication to ILO affairs, unfairly and unnecessarily flaunted the ILO supervisory system, setting a bad example for the faithful observance by developing countries having ratified the Convention.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom also spoke on behalf of the Workers' members. The Workers' members stated that it was difficult to determine from the statement made by the Government representative whether the Government had changed its position. They recalled that in 1991 there was unanimity on this case that a continued dialogue was necessary. The Government had been requested to take action to this end because this Committee was tired of dealing with a case of no progress and wanted to get on with its work in many other parts of the world. They noted that the Minister had not addressed this Committee on behalf of his Government and whilst they were sure that the Government representative who had spoken did so with the full authority of his Minister they considered that this could be considered to be partially a political issue since all parties at the recent General Election except the one elected promised to restore freedom of association at GCHQ. The politics of the United Kingdom did not concern this Committee but the issue had been raised to establish that this case did not concern a constitutional issue, since it could be argued that the other political parties which were willing to restore the rights of GCHQ workers were not concerned about national security. They noted that this was an old case which had been the subject of great speculation and discussion in the corridors. This case raised very serious questions about the authority of the standard-setting and supervisory functions of the ILO. If the Government of a well-known and formerly powerful country appeared to hamper, to equivocate or even to ignore the views of the Committee of Experts and of this Committee, then the whole process would be undermined. On the surface this case appeared to deal with a relatively small issue but if this Committee could not tackle a small case, a case which nevertheless concerned a vital principle, how could it deal with the horrors of some of the cases brought before it involving death squads and disappearances. The Government representative had not attempted to argue as they had done on previous occasions in detail that the situation of the GCHQ workers was not in contravention with the Convention. He had argued, however, that these workers did have a union. This "union", however, had no certificate of independence and was not accepted as a trade union. The High Court would shortly judge whether or not this union actually was independent. If the High Court determined that this union was not independent, then the Government would have to stop saying it was. Paradoxically, if the Court decided the union was independent, the Government would have to ban it. In any event, the question of whether the present situation at GCHQ was in contravention with the Convention had already been determined by the Committee of Experts and by this Committee last year and in previous years as a study of the conclusions on this case would show. In 1991, therefore, this Committee focused on the need for the Government to resume dialogue with the trade union on this case. They recognised the need for guaranteed, uninterrupted service at GCHQ and agreed that the Conference Committee could not indicate the manner in which this should be assured, but insisted that this be negotiated with the union. It was necessary to examine in detail the statement made by the Government representative that dialogue had taken place. The dialogue referred to by the Government representative consisted of the following:

- A letter from the Prime Minister to the TUC, immediately after the 1991 Conference, indicating its Government's continuing firm commitment to its present policy on union representation at GCHQ.
- A letter from the Head of the Home Civil Service to the civil service trade unions indicating the Government's intention that the ban on national trade unions at GCHQ would continue – and this was from the person appointed to have any discussions with the trade unions.
- A new letter from the Prime Minister in December 1991 reiterating his previous position.
- A meeting in which the Head of the Home Civil Service affirmed the Government's belief that it was not in contravention with the Convention and had not changed it position that the arrangements in GCHQ were fully satisfactory. The Head of the Home Civil Service further indicated that the Government knew of no arrangement which it might consider to resolve the situation in a satisfactory manner for both parties.

The Workers' members queried whether there was any point in discussing this case if the Government had no intention to change its position. They therefore requested the Government representative to indicate whether the Government might actually be willing to reach a conclusion which would be acceptable to both sides and thus reassure this Committee of a genuine dialogue so that real negotiations with the trade unions could take place.

The Employers' members recalled that this case concerned the Government Information Centre and that the work carried on there could not be interrupted for security reasons. In the beginning of the 1980s there had, however, been strikes there which led to the alternative offered to employees with the result that GCHQ workers no longer had the right to join the organisations of their own choosing. Over several years, there had practically been no contact between the Government and the trade union. Recently, however, there had been high-level conversations and even an initiative by the Prime Minister. The conclusions of this Committee in 1991 had been followed to little effect but there had, nevertheless, been a first contact had that consituted progress. The solution could only be found at the national level, but the Conference Committee could play a role as a catalyst and be a positive influence. Some new elements could be taken into account: new elections had been held and a new Labour Minister had been named and this might create a new atmosphere in the country; furthermore, a stronger Government could make more concessions. In any event, as had already been stated last year unanimously, discussions should resume and continue in a substantive manner and not only in form. Two elements were therefore essential: first, the Government had to be assured that the work at GCHQ would be carried out without interruption. Secondly, the workers had to be free to join the organisation of their choosing. The Employers' members appealed to the two parties to take up a constructive dialogue in order to attempt to find a solution.

A Government member of Switzerland noted the Government representative's indication that it was ready to continue a constructive dialogue and that indeed it appeared that a certain dialogue had been re-established. Even if some considered this dialogue to be sufficient and others felt that the Government only turned a deaf ear, progress could be noted as compared with previous years. As had been noted by the Workers' members and the Employers' members this was a case typically concerning internal politics, magnified by the circumstances. This situation came out of the circumstances prevailing in the beginning of the 1980s when the Government of the United Kingdom was involved in a conflict which directly threatened its security. The tense climate of international relations had changed and this détente could be found in the ILO. The Committee had therefore to show its wisdom and also its determination. Democracy was a valid concept for all countries; the universality of standards and the efficiency of the supervisory mechanism ensured that the Convention must be applied equally. This Committee must therefore make conclusions, very strict if necessary, inviting the Government, which had an important role in the ILO, to make a special effort to ensure dialogue. The Experts had emphasised in their report that workers had the right to establish organisations of their own choosing and that the right to organise did not prejudge the right to strike. The Committee of Experts had urged the Government to resume in the very near future constructive discussions calculated to lead, through genuine dialogue, to a compromise acceptable to both sides. The speaker urged the Government to respect the conclusions of the Committee of Experts in the same spirit.

A Workers' member of Pakistan stated that the member States of the ILO, whether developed or developing, must all respect the fundamental principles of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. One of the essential principles in this context was Convention No. 87. Universal principles applied in all countries and there should be no discrimination on this regard. Western countries which boasted to be the champions of democracy had responsibility and special obligations towards the ILO because they were among the countries which founded the Organisation. The United Kingdom had ratified the Convention in 1949 and when member States ratified a Convention they undertook to respect the relevant international obligations and to bring their legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee of Experts had clearly indicated that a change was necessary as concerned the situation at GCHQ and the speaker appealed to the Government to resume and intensify a real dialogue with the trade union so that the Convention would be respected.

A Government member of Canada recalled that the Convention established one explicit right and two implicit rights. The first was the right for workers' organisations to freely establish the organisation of their choosing. The two other rights concerned collective bargaining and the right to strike which were not explicity mentioned in the Convention but developed from the jurisprudence of the ILO's supervisory bodies. GCHQ workers were now members of a trade union which had the right to bargain collectively. They did not have the right to strike, but that fell under one of the exclusions accepted because of the nature of their activities. Still, they could not join a national trade union and this seemed to be due to the fact that, given the British system of industrial relations and legislation, the Government could not obtain any real guarantee that there would not be a strike at GCHQ if the workers in question were members of a national trade union, even if they gave a verbal guarantee. This Committee did not have ready-made answers but it was encouraging to note that the dialogue had been resumed when it had not existed for several years. It was perhaps not a very constructive dialogue up to now and there had not been concrete results, but the dialogue had been opened which, in itself, was encouraging. The speaker associated herself with the Employers' members in urging the Government to pursue the dialogue in a constructive spirit so that the parties themselves could come to a satisfactory agreement.

A Workers' member of Norway speaking also on behalf of the Workers' members of Denmark, Finland, Iceland and Sweden stated that the United Kingdom Government had not undertaken a real dialogue with the trade unions which would permit resolution of thes case. The trade unions had indicated that they were ready to conclude an agreement with the Government as concerns the right to strike. This case therefore could be resolved if the Government respected the right of workers to establish an independent trade union of their choosing. If the Government did not accept this compromise, that would constitute reason for mentioning this case in a special paragraph. Furthermore, they hoped that the Government in consultation with the International Labour Standards Department would submit this dispute as soon as possible to the International Court of Justice, as had been requested by the trade union. The Workers' members of the Nordic countries were bound to make a further appeal to discuss the question of mentioning this case in a special paragraph.

A Government member of Australia recalled that his Government had already spoken in 1991 to express its concern over the lack of progress in this case, which even if it largely concerned questions of a technical nature, also raised a problem of fundamental principles: the right of workers to freely organise. Still, this problem could never be resolved in a satisfactory fashion if the specific circumstances prevailing at GCHQ were not taken into account. The fact that there were discussions which were still open between the Government and the trade unions was encouraging, but it seemed that the dialogue had not been particularly positive or constructive up to now. Furthermore, the discussions had not given rise to concrete and specific proposals even though certain proposals had been made by the trade unions in 1984 to the House of Commons Select Committee on Employment. This case would never be resolved without a willingness on both sides and the speaker therefore firmly appealed to the Government to commit itself without reservation to a constructive dialogue in order to finally resolve this case.

A Workers' member of Spain stressed that the Government, in a letter sent to the trade union, had stated that it saw no use in the discussions. There had therefore been no progress but rather a step backwards since 1991. Concerning the substance of the issue, the problem was that the workers did not have the right to join organisations of their own choosing. The Government attempted to justify this prohibition because of the strategic importance of GCHQ, but if this were true, only workers in centres without any importance would then be able to have the right to join the organisation of their choosing. Freedom of association could not be subordinated to the importance of the establishment in which workers were employed. This approach would indirectly raise the question of who would decide on the strategic importance of an establishment. If it were the Government, then it would also have the right to determine which workers could or could not join the organisation of their choosing.

A Government member of the United States recalled that her Government had joined the consensus prevailing in this Committee in 1991 to appeal to the Government of the United Kingdom to resume a dialogue with the trade unions on the question of the GCHQ. Welcoming the interest and intent expressed by the Government to continue the dialogue, the speaker nevertheless expressed her regret that there had not been more progress more rapidly. She hoped that the Government would not only continue but intensify the dialogue with the trade unions with a view to determining whether it was possible to reach a mutually satisfactory solution taking into account the special needs at GCHQ. The effectiveness of the supervisory machinery depended on dialogue. This did not necessarily imply agreement, but rather a willingness to listen to the other party and efforts of good faith by both sides to create an atmosphere of real and constructive dialogue. This Committee could not solve this issue in the place of the Government and the United Kingdom trade unions, but it should be hoped that its efforts would help the parties to find a solution.

A Workers' member of Greece stated that if the dialogue begun in this Committee did not continue in the country in question, then it was a dialogue among the deaf. The United Kingdom was one of the most industrialised countries with a long democratic tradition, and which affirmed the respect of trade union rights and liberties. It did not respect this cConvention, one of the essential ILO Conventions, if not the most fundamental. It this developed, democratic country adopted such an attitude, what could be hoped for from developing countries which were confronted with serious economic difficulties? The attention of the United Kingdom Government should be drawn to this aspect because its attitude put the ILO in danger.

A Government member of Germany expressed his disagreement with respect to certain comments made by the Committee of Experts. First, as concerned the relationship between Conventions Nos. 87 and 151, there was no doubt that the latter established a specific standard which took precedence over the former or complemented it. The attitude of the United Kingdom Government in this case, however, was clearly not in violation with Convention No. 151. If the Experts felt that there was a violation of Convention No. 87, that would mean that the Conference, 14 years ago, had intentionally accepted the possibility that there were situations compatible with the new Convention No. 151, but not with Convention No. 87, adopted almost 30 years earlier and already ratified by a large number of countries. Secondly, the speaker expressed his reservations with respect to the rigidity of the Committee of Experts which had not taken into account the fact that the Secret Services in the United Kingdom were subordinated to the Home Office and not to the Ministry of Defence. The speaker recalled that he had entirely subscribed to the opinion of the Conference Committee in 1991 to urge the United Kingdom Government to enter into dialogue. The Government representative had indicated that there had been dialogue both written and oral, but the speaker stressed that this must be more than a mere formal contact. There must be in reality a resumption of true dialogue on the substance. The Committee should perhaps also give some indication in these discussion so that the Committee of Experts, when it meets again in March 1993, could proceed with an examination of the correspondance exchanged and the contents of the discussions. Without going as far as to suggest to this Committee that it should give indications on the contents of this dialogue, as had been done by the Workers' member of Norway, the speakert stated that the dialogue must be pursued and improved.

A Workers' member of the United States, in the name of the Workers' members, requested the Government representative to indicate whether, in resuming the dialogue, the Government was prepared to reconsider the prohibition made for workers at GCHO to freely join the organisation of their own choosing. Only if the reply to this question was affirmative would this be a constructive and real dialogue which would permit movement towards a satisfactory solution.

The Government representative thanked all the speakers for their contributions and assured the Conference Committee that he had taken careful note of all the points made. He recalled, as had already been indicated by a number of speakers, that prior to this Committee's meeting in 1991 no discussion had taken place between the Government and the national trade unions for over six years. The core of the Committee's 1991 request, therefore, was that this situation would change. The dialogue now has been reopened. It must be recalled, however, that the issue was an extremely sensitive one and that it would be extremely difficult to find a solution which would sufficiently protect and maintain the interests of all the parties concerned. Nevertheless his Government wished to maintain and develop a constructive dialogue with the trade unions. He considered that the best chance for progress would be through the continuation of the dialogue rather than calling up past differences. He assured this Committee that: (1) he would personally and immediatly report to the Ministers on the views expressed and conclusions reached in this Committee; (2) the dialogue which had been resumed with the trade unions remained open; (3) his Government would continue the dialogue to look for a solution which both fully safeguarded the national security interests and was acceptable to the parties involved.

The Workers' members noted that this Committee was entitled to have some expectation that there would be a solution to this case. As concerns the Employers' members' comment concerning the fact that a new Government was in power, they expressed the hope that the Government's new position of strength would enable it to be generous and to enter into a constructive dialogue. They agreed that there must be an assurance that there would be no interruption in the work carried out at GCHQ, but the workers must also be guaranteed the right to join the trade union of their own choosing. With reference to the comment made by the Government member of Canada concerning the difficulty in ensuring that there would be no strikes at GCHQ if the workers were permitted to join national trade unions, they recalled that it was possible for governments to introduce restrictions on strikes which were perfectly in conformity with the Convention. It therefore was possible to reach a conclusion satisfactory to the concerns of both parties which would be conformity with the Convention. The Federation which GCHQ employees could presently join was not a true trade union and had not been accepted for registration as an independent trade union. They stressed that they were not promoting the interests of individual trade unions but rather the issue of the freedom to join the trade union of one's own choosing. No practical proposals had been put forward by the Government before this Committee to resolve this case. Clearly a dialogue was not merely a succession of monologues. As had been indicated by the Government member of Germany, a serious will to produce results had to be demonstrated by the Government. A special paragraph had been proposed for this case and this question seemed to dominate the concerns of this Committee's members. The more important issue, however, was not whether to have a special paragraph, but rather how to ensure free trade unionism at GCHQ. A special paragraph was not only to be used for serious violations against human rights but also as a special note to express regret at the refusal of a government to cooperate with the Committee of Experts and this Committee, which had in fact happened in this case. They could forgo the special paragraph if they could be reassured that the Government intended to make all efforts to ensure genuine dialogue on this question with a view towards a solution acceptable to both parties. They urged that the conclusions be drawn up very firmly in that light and in a manner which made it clear that substantial progress had to be made. The Government representative appeared in his final statement when he referred to a solution "which was acceptable to the parties involved" to be attempting to fulfill the commitment requested by this Committee. It appears that the Government representative felt this to be so and if this now was shared by the whole committee a special paragraph would not be appropriate.

The Employers' members stressed the large consensus in this Committee concerning the evaluation of the situation at GCHQ. All the speakers had expressed the hope that the discussions begun would continue in a more intensive and constructive fashion and that they be more targeted. Nevertheless, two essential elements had to be present in order to find a satisfactory solution for both sides: the Government must be assured that the work would not be interrupted, and the workers must be free to join the organisation of their choosing. It was not for this Committee to indicate in detail to the parties the manner in which to arrive at such a solution, but the fact that the Minister himself would intervene now in the dialogue should be welcomed as it constituted an additional guarantee of success.

The Committee took note of the general discussion on the question of the nature and complexity of the legislation, and of the information supplied by the Government in this connection. It understood the Government's undertaking to suplly full particulars to the Committee of Experts on the different points raised by that Committee. It hoped to be in the position to make a full assessment of the situation at its next session. Concerning the GCHQ question, the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative as well as of the discussions which had taken place. The Committee once again had to express its deep concern at the continued refusal of the Government to implement the Convention as regards the situation of workers at GCHQ who still did not enjoy the right to join a union of their own choosing. The Committee noted the correspondence exchanged and the recent meeting at a high level which took place with the unions. Nevertheless it deplored that these initiatives did not result yet in a genuine dialogue and did not meet so far the wishes expressed by the Committee last year. Taking due note of the Government's declared intention to reach a solution on this question, satisfactory to all parties concerned, it strongly hoped that this statement would be rapidly followed by a substantive, frank and constructive dialogue, carried out in good faith, so that a solution in full conformity with the Convention could be found to this problem which had been raised by the Committee of Experts and discussed by the Conference Committee for many years. The Committee expressed the very firm hope that, as from next year, it would be able to take note of substantial progress in this matter. The Committee intended to examine this case again at its next session of the Conference.

Convention No. 95: Protection of Wages, 1949

Iraq (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that his Government respected the provisions of the Convention. Wages were paid in conformity with Chapter 4 of the Labour Code No. 71 of 1987, which contained detailed provisions concerning the protection and the payment of wages. In reference to the problem of payment of wages to Egyptian workers, he indicated that those workers who had left Iraq prior to the embargo had received any wages that were owed to them as well as the percentage which should have been transferred in foreign currency within the appropriate deadlines. The workers who had left Iraq since the imposition of the embargo had received their wages in the national currency, in conformity with the law, with the exception of the percentage which was to be transferred in foreign currency. The Government representative clarified that the payment of this percentage was linked to the economic conditions that existed in Iraq since the imposition of the economic embargo; the latter had resulted in the freezing of its assets in foreign banks, and had not yet been lifted. His Government wished to fulfil the obligations that it had towards Egyptian workers and other foreign workers, and would do so as soon as the embargo was lifted and it was able to recover the assets frozen in foreign countries. He requested the ILO and other international organisations to intervene so that the embargo would be lifted, as it was having disastrous effects on the people of Iraq as well as on migrant workers. In respect of the protection of wages of foreign workers in Iraq, he stated that the law provided the protection that was necessary for this purpose. The wages of foreign workers were paid in conformity with the law previously referred to, and in conformity with the agreements concluded between workers and employers. The wages of Filipino workers were paid in compliance with the law and with the agreement concluded between the two countries. This agreement included provisions contained in Convention No. 95. Transfers of funds of migrant workers to foreign countries had been made in compliance with the appropriate directions.

The Workers' members recalled that the problem concerning the application the Convention had been the subject of observations of the Committee of Experts for many years, and had been discussed in 1989 and 1990, in particular, by the Conference Committee. Two matters were pointed out by the Committee of Experts. The first arose from the report of the Governing Body committee that was responsible for the examination of the complaint submitted by the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions pursuant to article 24 of the Constitution. The Governing Body invited the Government to take all appropriate measures to ensure that Egyptian workers obtained full payment of amounts owing to them in respect of wages. On the basis of the information provided by the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions concerning the number of workers and the amounts to be paid, and the information supplied by the Government concerning the payment of these amounts, it was noted that only part of the payments had been made. They therefore stressed that all amounts owing in respect of wages be paid and transferred to the Egyptian workers as soon as possible. The Government was also asked, as previously agreed, to provide detailed responses to all the questions raised by the Committee of Experts on these matters. The second question concerned the very important problem, which had already been dealt with by this Committee, regarding the payment of wages in the form of promissory notes or any other form alleged to represent legal tender. Such payments had been prohibited by Article 3 of the Convention. In their opinion, this Convention was of great practical importance for migrant workers. For this reason, any derogations in this area that were made at the level of the enterprise, at the national level or through bilateral agreements between States were unacceptable. During discussion of this year's General Survey on Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery, the Workers' members emphasised the importance of respect for Convention No. 95. They also urged the Government to fully respect Convention No. 95 in all its bilateral agreements and to review, if necessary, the content of these agreements to the extent that they contravened the principles of this Convention. They also stressed that the Government should supply all the information requested by the Committee of Experts concerning the situation in practice, and inform it of any intervening new developments in bilateral agreements concluded with the Philippines and other countries.

The Employers' members noted that this case involved an entire range of complex questions. A considerable part of the wages owing to the numerous Egyptian workers emplyed in Iraq had been frozen and not paid to them; this problem was not linked exclusively to the political and military events which had taken place. Although part of these wages had since been released, the situation was unclear in respect of large amounts of these wages, and they therefore supported the questions and demands of the Experts concerning this matter. They stated that they wished information from the Government regarding the number of workers affected, and the amounts in question; the amounts that had been paid until now; and when and what specific measures had been taken in order to deal with cases that had not yet been settled. In respect of the Government's statement that it was not in a position or ready to deal with such matters because of the embargo, they stressed that this situation must not affect workers who were not responsible for the political events that had occurred. The unpaid workers had a contractual right to the money owed, the Convention protected their wages, and the Government must guarantee this protection. The second area of concern of the Employers' members was the payment of wages to foreign workers. Originally the Committee had dealt with a situation involving Philippino workers in Iraq. It was originally unclear whether there was any agreement between Iraq and the Phillipines in respect of these workers, and the nature of the contents of any such agreement were also unknown. It now seemed clear that this and other agreements did exist between Iraq and countries whose workers were or had been employed in Iraq. However, they stressed that there should be agreements with all such countries, in order to protect the wages of all workers as required by the Convention. They indicated their support for the request from the Committee of Experts for precise written detailed information concerning existing and draft wage protection laws which were or were to be applied to all foreign workers employed in Iraq, and whether the same protection of wages was provided to all workers, as established in the Convention.

A Workers' member from Italy, after having recalled the relationship between the embargo and the freeze of Iraqi assets in countries other than Iraq with the payment of wages to foreign workers, emphasised the importance of establishing agreements between countries which employed migrant workers and countries from which such workers originated, in order to regulate these matters. He stated that there should be as much clarity as possible in this area not only for institutions but also for migrant workers.

A Workers' member from Greece stated that he was not able to accept the information given by the Government representative to the effect that the wages of the migrant workers would be paid when the embargo was lifted, and the Iraqi assets in foreign banks unfrozen. He stressed that the migrant workers, who were in no way responsible for the troubles that had occurred in Iraq, should not bear the consequences.

The Government representative stated that all workers deserved protection, including Iraqi workers who were subject to very difficult conditions. Thousands of persons were dying because of a lack of food and medicine, including children and even foreign workers. He hoped that this situation would be taken into consideration when the Government refers to the payment of wages. In reference to the explanations that had been requested regarding the number of Egyptian workers affected and the amounts owing, he indicated that he had not been able to contact the competent authorities in order to obtain this information, as the report of the Committee of Experts arrived one week prior to the Conference. The Government will send this information in a detailed report. With regard to the agreement with the Philippines, he explained that this bilateral agreement was renewed without either of the parties objecting to its contents. His Government had taken into consideration all the international standards when signing bilateral agreements. It will send the ILO a detailed report on this matter in the near future.

A Worker member of Iraq stated that the Confederation of Iraqi Workers considered itself responsible for the protection of all Arab and foreign workers. In the past, prior to the unfortunate and known events, the problems of Egyptian workers had been resolved jointly with the Egyptian workers and his Confederation. The Confederation was paying Iraqi and foreign workers who had lost their job monthly salaries which were financed by the contributions of Iraqi workers to the Confederation. He admitted that a debt was owing to the Egyptian workers and hoped that it would be settled soon, in spite of the serious difficulties which his country was daily encountering.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government. It understood that considerable sums of money due to foreign workers as wages had not been transferred to them because of the freeze of Iraqi assets. The Committee pointed out that under the provisions of the Convention, foreign workers should not be the victim of political difficulties in the region between the Government and other countries. It therefore urged the Government to revise its position on this point. The Committee furthermore asked the Government to supply in the near future written information containing full particulars concerning the agreements the Government had entered into with governments of countries whose nationals worked or had worked in Iraq, as well as information concerning the other points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative expressed reservations about the text of the conclusions concerning the freeze of government assets, and reiterated that the Government was not responsible for the freeze nor for the embargo.

Convention No. 98: Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, 1949

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, referred to the request contained in the report of the Committee of Experts in respect of this Convention. The Committee had requested that the necessary measures be taken in order to grant to those "public employees", who were not engaged in the administration of the State, with the guarantees set out in the Convention in respect of the negotiation of collective agreements. In Colombia there was a distinction made between public employees and official workers which had involved a number of petitions. He indicated that written information had been provided by the Government on the different points raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members noted that in providing the right to collective bargaining for public workers, the Convention referred to those engaged in the administration of the State as a possible exception to this right. However, they stressed that the Committee of Experts did not consider that there should be a very broad distinction made to the effect that all civil servants could be considered to be involved in administering the State. Although the Minister himself and his immediate, top-level staff, could be included in this category, this exception did not extend to include all public servants. They noted that that an ILO mission had reported that Presidential Directive No. 38 of 1990 confirmed the prohibition placed on unions of public employees and related collective agreements. They believed that if ILO technical assistance were given to the Government, it would be informed conclusively by the ILO that the administration of the State could not be given as wide a definition as the Government wished to maintain.

The Employers' members considered that the only question to be answered concerned the kinds of public service employees that should be included in the category of state administration. In their view, this category should include all the personnel needed to operate a secretariat, and not just the minister and his secretaries. They did not think that this should be a fixed boundary or limit, but only one of the factors to be considered when asking for ILO assistance in order to arrive at a sensible regulation of the distinction between those who may engage in collective bargaining and those may strike.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that in Colombia the right to bargain collectively was being infringed upon and that there were directives of the Government that result in such infringements. Decree No. 2914 of 30 December 1991, approving the budget for incomes and expenditures of state industrial and commercial enterprises and joint economy companies, states in article 18 the necessity for prior authorisation of the Superior Council of Fiscal Policy (CONFIS) in order to exceed the percentage of salary adjustment set by the national Government. Article 10 of Act No. 4 of 1992 established that all salary or benefit structures that were found to have contravened the provisions contained in this law, or in the Decrees made by the national Government, would lack all effect and as a consequence no rights would be acquired under such structures.

A Workers' member of Italy indicated that on 27 June 1992 the three Italian trade unions would hold a demonstration against the Mafia and the murder of the Italian judge Mr. Falcone. He requested the Government to provide information concerning the dozens of trade unionists and activists in the area of human rights and social justice who had been killed.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government from which it gathered that the Government's concept of public employees engaged in the administration of the State remained too wide. It therefore expressed the hope that the Government would comply with the suggestions of the Committee of Experts and send a full report about the amendments envisaged to change the law.

Malaysia (ratification: 1961). A Government representative noted section 13(3) of the Industrial Relations Act and its non-conformity with Article 4 of the Convention and that more detailed clarification of the explanations supplied to the Committee of Experts was necessary. Under section 13(3) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1967, the following matters, which the Government representative referred to as management functions, were excluded as subjects for collective bargaining: promotion; transfer; employment; terminations; dismissal and reinstatement; and assignment or allocation of duties or specific tasks to a worker. However, such matters could be raised by trade unions in discussions with an employer or employers' organisations, within or outside the course of collective bargaining, if these matters affected the individual worker. In his view, the trade union was therefore free to fully utilise its collective bargaining machinery to settle issues relating to terms and conditions of employment. The six matters excluded from collective bargaining had been the subject of negotiation, conciliation and arbitration, as well as decisions of the Industrial Court, High Court and Supreme Court, and amounted to 54.2 per cent of all disputes dealt with by the Department of Industrial Relations during the past five years. He considered that these six areas were internal management functions or prerogatives, and that the provision in question was merely a restatement of the rights of employers under contract law. These prerogatives were subject to limitations, for example, transfers could not be made mala fide, as a means of victimisation, as an unfair labour practice or for any other ulterior motive. He emphasised that the Industrial Relations Act provided sufficient protection for workers' rights. In his view, section 13(3) concerned matters leading to individual disputes, but had little relation to collective agreements. A further restriction on the exercise of the employers' rights was provided in section 5(2), which provided that such rights could only be exercised for proper cause. As regards the position of companies granted pioneer status under section 6 of the Promotion of Investments Act, 1966, the Government representative stated that trade unions in companies granted pioneer status were not allowed to conclude collective agreements granting benefits relating to rest days, hours of work, holidays, annual leave, sick leave and payment for extra work (referred to as non-monetary items) that were more favourable than those contained under Part XII of the Employment Act, 1955, unless the provisions were approved by the Minister of Human Resources. However, such trade unions and companies could without restriction conclude collective agreements regarding such matters as wages, bonuses, allowances, compassionate leave, paternity leave, unpaid leave, study leave, trade union leave, maternity leave, retirement benefit, and other terms and conditions of employment. The Government representative emphasised that although the repeal of section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act, 1967, was currently being discussed with the employers' organisation and workers, job creation was a priority because of the present circumstances of the country, and for this reason such a repeal would not be made until the appropriate circumstances existed. The restriction on the right to bargain collectively of employees in public administration (850,000 employees), pursuant to section 52 of the Industrial Relations Act, 1969, was primarily because of the differing objectives of the public and private sectors. The public sector was service rather than profit-oriented and therefore wages paid to public sector employees were not based on the same principles that applied to the private sector. All civil servants were governed by the same General Orders, and their duties were classified as "supporting elements" so that they were among those engaged in the "administration of the State". The Government representative stated that in the public sector negotiations and discussions took place at the national level; since the late 1970s five National Joint Councils for the public service had negotiated wage increases and working conditions and had engaged in consultation on behalf of public employees. Such negotiations resulted in a significant pay increase in 1989 and the offer of a New Remuneration System in 1991. In addition, a Joint Committee was formed on 30 October 1985. The Joint Committee signed a Joint Declaration on 6 June 1986 agreeing to meet regularly for the settlement of disputes arising from claims in respect of salary and other terms and conditions of employment of public administration employees. He emphasised that this was evidence that the Government did, in practice, negotiate with its employees on such matters.

The Workers' members recalled that these questions concerning the Convention had been raised by the Committee of Experts for a long time and that they were discussed in the Conference Committee in 1981, 1983 and 1985. They noted that the report and the replies of the Government had not shown any progress since 1985. Information should be communicated by the Government to the Office so that the extent to which new developments might have taken place could be examined by the Committee of Experts. The two major problems concern firstly the contents of the legislation under discussion, and secondly the attitude of the Government towards the supervisory system and the universality of standards. As regards the content of the legislation, it essentially concerns the Government's control over collective bargaining illustrated by three divergences between the national legislation and Article 4 of the Convention as mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Government not only restricts the scope of collective bargaining but made the legislation in such a way that the workers could not be treated on equal footing with the employers, as is shown in section 13(3) of the Industrial Relations Act. The spirit of this legislation was confirmed by the Government, namely that questions enumerated in section 13(3) such as promotions, transfers, dismissals should not be the subject of negotiations because this could lead to prolonged strife since the managers are unlikely to agree to any erosion of their rights during the process of negotiating a collective agreement. This explanation demonstrates an imbalanced attitude of the Government to collective bargaining and also its paternalistic spirit. Besides, the legislation excludes the workers of pioneering enterprises from the possibility of concluding agreements during five years on such fundamental aspects of their working conditions as working hours, paid leave, annual or sick leave, which causes a problem, especially for the enterprises in the export processing zones. The Workers' members would never accept a selective or partial application of international labour standards. The possibility provided by the Act for the Minister to validate negotiations affecting these working conditions underlined further interventionism of the State and its attitude towards the parties. As to the attitude of the Government concerning the application of standards, particularly the universality of standards, the Workers' members observed that the Committee of Experts noted the Government's opinion that "there should not be a too legalistic or technical approach taken over the application of ratified Conventions in this era of increasing protectionism adopted by certain trading blocs and that the attempt of developing countries to develop their economies and eradicate poverty should be looked at in a positive light". The Workers' members stated that such objectives of socioeconomic development were normal but should not be put in opposition with the standards and fundamental rights enshrined in the Convention. They could not accept such an attitude of the Government and referred to the resolution concerning freedom of association and freedom of collective bargaining adopted by the 11th Asian Regional Conference, as well as to their own statement during the general discussion and to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in the Case No. 1552 concerning Malaysia in which that Committee recalled that fundamental human rights such as those guaranteed by the Convention should be respected whatever the level of development of the country. The Workers' members urged the Government to eliminate the restrictions contained in the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and stated that a visit on the spot by the ILO would perhaps help to overcome the difficulties. They expressed their great concern of the situation of the application of the Convention in Malaysia because the trade union movement as a whole was concerned. It concerns a conflict between long standing values, methods and principles of the ILO on the one hand and the Government's unacceptable interpretion of the obligations arising under the Convention on the other.

The Employers' members stated that the ideal of the Convention was free collective bargaining, but that the reality in many countries was far from this ideal. In Malaysia certain aspects regarding the functions of management could not be the subject of collective bargaining, although they were not outside of all regulatory measures because an appeal was possible to a tribunal. Such aspects as wages could be negotiated collectively, while other aspects were regulated in a different manner. Such situations were common in many countries and demonstrated that there was no absolute freedom of collective bargining. In Malaysia, therefore, there was no total restriction, but important exclusions remained, and the Government should reconsider the possibility of widening the scope of collective bargaining. As regards pioneer enterprises, especially those in export processing zones, although wages could be the object of collective bargaining, restrictions remained as regards some other working conditions; these could be the subject of collective bargaining but needed to be submitted for ministerial approval (which had never been refused). Such measures are usual and widespread so as to promote a new economy in a developing country, but they were not in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Government representative stated that it contemplated removing this prohibition because it considered that industry in protected zones was prosperous enough to be covered by normal legislation and treated on an equal footing with other branches; legislation could thus be brought into conformity with the Convention on this point. The Government should intensify its efforts in this regard. As concerns the restrictions of right to bargain for certain employees of the public service, the Government contemplated privatisation in this field. This was a positive move which would resolve the problem because private sector employees can bargain collectively. Nevertheless, concerning the public service, there remained a gap with the objectives of the Convention. The Employers' members wished that the Government would conform with the requirements of the Convention.

An Employers' member of Malaysia considered that the provisions under section 13(3) of the Act were "measures appropriate to national conditions" and were not incompatible with Article 4 of the Convention. Somebody's right is always subject to the right of others. The right of workers to collective bargain must be viewed against certain rights of employers relating, for example, to promotion, transfer and assignment of duties. Employers are responsible for managing the enterprise, although they cannot exercise their right unfairly. There are court cases against employers acting without just cause. Section 13(3) must be seen within the context of other legislative provisions and practices in Malaysia. Could one ever bargain in an unlimited way with regard to appointment, promotion, transfer or assignment of duties? The speaker hoped that the Committee would review the conclusion of the Committee of Experts relating to section 13(3) accordingly.

A Workers' member of Japan remarked that this case had been before the Committee for many years without progress. There were three questions: (i) limitation on the scope of negotiable matters; (ii) prohibition with regard to pioneer industries; and (iii) restriction on the right to bargain collectively for employees in public services. Although such restrictions exist in many countries in Asia, the Malaysian case was a serious one. The speaker expressed concern at the attitude of the Government and the impression given by the report that the situation appeared to have deteriorated. He pointed out that the Government's intention to take measures only when political, economic and social conditions of the country warranted it, was no assurance at all and would mean that the Government had the right to interpret the Convention as it liked. He also remarked that Malaysia, which used to have relatively liberal labour legislation, had gradually tightened its grip over trade union rights, while its economy developed at a high speed. He requested the Government represantative to respond to the suggestion by the Committee of Experts that technical assistance from the Office could be requested for the purpose of bringing the law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

A Workers' member of the United States strongly supported the statement made by the Workers' spokesman. Noting the Government's statement of intention to improve the situation in each of the three areas discussed, he pointed out some contradictions in the first statement that the provision would not be repealed until the political, economic and social conditons of the country warranted it, and the subsequent statement that active steps were now being taken to repeal this provision. The speaker emphasised a need for the Government to submit these new undertakings for evaluation by the Committee of Experts.

A Workers' member of Malaysia indicated the improvement in political, economic and social conditions in Malaysia, with economic growth of 8.8 per cent, and an unemployment rate of about 4.4 per cent. As regards section 13(3), unionised workers may be able to talk with employers and apply pressure regarding these matters, but non-unionised workers would be helpless when section 13(3) protects rights of employers to hire and fire. The speaker hoped, regarding pioneer enterprises, that the matter would be dealt with in the country within a tripartite discussion. As to the public sector, the speaker pointed out that there was no collective bargaining right for the public serivce except for the matters regarding which the public sevice union submitted a claim to the Government. The Government considered, the Cabinet decided and the matter was referred to the union for acceptance, which is not real collective bargaining.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands requested the Office to explain the reason why this case had not been discussed since 1985. The speaker pointed out that the Convention not only granted the right to bargain collectively but also had a definite promotional character. As regards section 13(3), noting the Government's statement that workers could negotiate if they really wanted, he wondered why the Government put in the legislation that these elements should be excluded from collective bargaining.

A Workers' member of Romania stated that the workers of his country were worried by the attitude of the Malaysian Government regarding international labour standards, in particular this Convention, because such an attitude would be against the freedom of collective bargaining and values of the Constitution of the ILO. The universality of standards, in particular of free collective bargaining between two parties on equal footing was an essential value. Coming out of a totalitarian system which always refused the universality of standards, Romanian workers did not want such ideology to continue any longer.

A Workers' member of Uganda, noting that Malaysia was economically relatively well-place, expressed surprise and disappointment as the Government stated that the prohibition of workers' rights was intended to promote investment, stimulate growth and generate employment opportunity and that the Government considered such matters as hours of work, holidays, annual and sick leave as not fundamental. The speaker expressed a worry that, if the suppression of workers' rights could not be stopped, it would threaten the good work done by the ILO and would also threaten other countries which grant such rights, because any country, needing to promote investment and to stimulate industrial growth, might follow the example of Malaysia. The speaker, referring to the Government's intention for privatisation, stated that there was no guarantee that the Government would not protect the investor after privatisation. He disagreed with the Employers' member of Malaysia in relating the rights of workers with the rights of employers.

A Workers' member of Pakistan referred to the General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining and noted that, according to the Government, privatisation would open the way to bargaining. As regards section 13(3), such issues as lay-off, retrenchment and promotion should not be excluded from bargaining and he looked forward to positive legislative developments in this area.

A Workers' member of Ecuador was particularly concerned by the case of Malaysia: there was no doubt about the importance attached to the Convention by both Workers' and Employers' members. As one of the objectives of collective bargaining was to contribute and to promote progress and economic development and to eliminate poverty, he was surprised that the Government felt that the Convention should be applied on the basis of political, economic and social conditions in a country. The economic situation was also of concern in Latin American countries: if the Government's criteria was followed, the application of this Convention would be a privilege of rich countries which less favoured countries could not realise. This would be contrary to the principle of universality of standards. The idea that collective bargaining could hinder development and contribute to increased misery was, to say the least, inappropriate. Referring to the restrictions on collective bargaining rights of public service employees, the speaker believed that the activities of the National Joint Council – which the Government felt would allow partial application of the Convention – were totally insufficient. Concerning the privatisation of various state enterprises and its impact – anticipated by the Employers' spokesman – on the right of workers to collectively bargain, the speaker considered this not to be the issue: the question was whether there existed the right to collectively bargain as provided for in the Convention. As this case had been discussed for many years, he hoped that the Government would in the future make substantial progress.

A Workers' member of Germany supported the statement of the Workers' spokesman regarding, in particular, the right of public servants to bargain collectively; in this regard the Convention laid down the minimum standard. Under the Convention each State had to guarantee the right to organise and to bargain collectively and it is indispensible that enterprise management recognise the importance of collective bargaining at the enterprise level. It should be possible to fix wages and other conditions of work through collective bargaining with management. Both workers' and employers' organisations participate in this process; the setting of conditions of work is neither a privilege for workers nor a prerogative of management, but a right which belongs to both parties. In order to promote the development of one region or a part of the country, recourse could be had to financial incentives, protective measures, or other governmental policies; such development should not be promoted by limiting collective bargaining rights. When a State ratifies this Convention it undertakes to guarantee free collective bargaining. The authorities had to guarantee collective bargaining rights even in multinational enterprises and had to resist contrary pressures from such enterprises.

Another Workers' member of Malaysia stated that, although section 13(3) forbids collective bargaining on promotions and transfers, clauses on these subjects were in actual practice signed and agreed to in collective bargaining. Many transfers and promotions have even been successfully challenged. It was a wrong impression that the law prevented workers or unions from acting in these areas.

A Government member of the Congo stated that the problem under discussion contained aspects of both principle and practice; it was the practical aspect which interested him since a similar situation existed in his country. A balance should be found between the right of different categories of workers to negotiate collectively all the aspects of their working conditions and legitimate management prerogatives. In some developing countries workers had become practically like the employers during collective bargaining; this undoubtedly explained part of the situation in Malaysia. The protection of investors could be realised by, for example, prescribing in internal regulations the role of each institution, in particular that of trade unions. The systematic prohibition by public authorities of collective bargaining should be avoided; legislation making such provision should be modified. One should find a way in which, in practice, all concerned maintain their powers.

The representative of the Secretary-General replied to the question put by a Workers' member concerning the reasons why the Office did not include this case on the list of individual cases since 1985. The Office does not draw up this list. In fact the draft list of individual cases is elaborated in the Employers' and Workers' groups, and then is examined by the Officers of the Committee who then submit this list to the Committee for approval. The Secretariat does not play any role in this process, except for readily responding to any requests for information. Besides, the Committee of Experts made observations on this case in 1987, 1989, 1991 and 1992, that is to say, every year in which this Convention had to be examined.

The Government representative explained that the question of "attitude" as raised by many Workers' members was solely based on one's perception and pre-determined values. Stressing that Malaysia certainly had better track records in the area of workers' rights compared to many other countries, he stated that he would not wish to be drawn into unnecessary debate on that subject-matter.

The Government representative stated that the rights of workers should be weighed against the rights of the employers, and that the denial of the latter would only be detrimental to workers' interests by leading to such things as bankruptcies. The right of the employers to manage did not restrict the workers' right to collective bargaining. He stressed that discussions had been taking place with the social partners on the possible deletion of section 15 relating to the restrictions on collective agreements in certain new undertakings, and as such Malaysia could not accept the assertion that there had been no progress made since the last report. It was also explained that the six issues stipulated in section 13(3) were not absolute and were increasingly being negotiated. As to the question of universality, he emphasised that one has to look and diagnose the situation in a particular country by looking into the context of the situation and the level of economic development. He further stressed that everyone including those in the Committee were duty bound to help workers find employment, share their incomes and improve their standard of living. He reiterated that in the public service there was negotiation and conciliation on matters pertaining to wages and conditions of service. The Government representative stated, regarding the possibility of technical assistance by the ILO, that if the ILO considers it necessary to send a mission, the Government would be glad to receive it.

The Workers' members stated that it was indispensable for the Government to communicate shortly a report for examination by the Committee of Experts. They were surprised to see the Government representative repeat the logic of the Employers' member of Malaysia that the rights of some limit the rights of others. They did not understand, regarding the Convention concerning collective bargaining and the possibility to reach agreement, how one could speak of limiting the right to negotiate and therefore to reach agreement. It concerns the freedom to discuss. The Workers' members recalled their earlier suggestion that if the Government considers that there remained problems of interpretation, it could call for assistance or a visit on the spot by the Office.

The Committee noted with some disappointment the information given by the Government, recalling that this case has been the subject of its concern on different prior occasions. It felt bound to emphasise the seriousness of the protection and promotion of the right to bargain collectively as guaranteed under the Convention. The Committee therefore urged the Government to reconsider its position and make use of the good services of the ILO in that respect. It hoped that the Government would send a report with full particulars, to the ILO to enable the Committee to find the legislation to be in complete conformity with the Convention at one of its next sessions.

Pakistan (ratification : 1952). A Government representative noted that the main point raised by the Committee of Experts concerned the Wage Commission. Until recently, all banks and financial institutions in the public sector. There were two options for dealing with them, either (1) to allow all institutions to bargain on their own behalf or (2) to take steps to ensure uniformity in this sector. The Government had decided to introduce a uniform system for these banks. A Wage Commission was periodically set up at the demand of the workers. This Commission was tripartite in nature with representation from both workers and employers. The Chair was usually a senior judge in Pakistan. Both parties could present their demands before the Chair who would act as moderator and as arbitrator when a decision had to be taken. In reality, therefore, this system actually permitted for a negotiation process directly with the employer. If the positions of the workers and employers were blocked, the Chair tended to determine in favour of the worker. Recently, ten new banks had been established in the private sector, two of which had been national banks. Financial institutions were likely to become privatised as well. As the situation progressed, there would come a time when the Government would no longer need to enforce uniformity and the need for the Wage Commission might be reconsidered. At present, however, this system still worked and there had been no complaints from the workers in these institutions. Furthermore, these workers do have their own associations to represent them and have the right to strike.

The Workers' members noted that the Committee of Experts was obliged to repeat the comments it had been making concerning the non-application of this Convention on certain points since 1988. Furthermore, this case had been discussed in this Committee on previous occasions. The Committee of Experts had noted that free collective bargaining was not available to workers in the banking and financial sector, to airline workers and to workers in export processing zones. According to the information provided by the Government, the study undertaken to determine whether workers objected to the system of negotiation within the Wage Commission or whether they preferred direct bargaining indicated that the present system was working perfectly well and there were no problems. The Workers' members pointed out that this study would of course depend on the type of questions the workers were asked and the circumstances in which they were able to reply. Perhaps the Government representative had more information on this point. In any event, the Convention provided that workers had the right to bargain collectively directly with their employer without interference from an outside body. They appealed to the Government to review the provisions of th O[illegible]nce concerning the rights of workers in the banking and financial sector in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' members associated themselves with statement made by the Workers' members. They recalled that the discussion concerning the export processing zones already had taken place under Convention No. 87. The only permissible way of setting wages under this Convention was through direct collective bargaining. The Government, however, maintained an alternative system to that allowed under the Convention. It appeared that the problem would be resolved over time as the banking and financial sectors were privatised. Corrective action should, nevertheless, be taken as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of Pakistan appealed to the Government to review the situation in the banking sector and suggested that it consider technical assistance from the Office. The right to bargain directly with the employer should be provided to all workers, whether in the private sector or the public sector.

The Government representative indicated that this Government would request technical assistance from the Office in this regard.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government with some disappointment. It felt bound to conclude that no real progress had been made on the points raised by the Committee of Experts on previous occasions. In view, however, of the Government's willingness to ask for technical assistance, it expressed the firm hope that the Government would be in a position to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention in the near future.

Syrian Arab Republic (ratification: 1957). A Government representative, observing that the Committee of Experts considered section 98 of the Labour Code to be in contradiction with Article 4 of the Convention, stated that his Government did not think it was the case, for the following reasons:

- firstly, the economic interests of any country are part of the public order which is the whole group of laws and regulations related to the basic interests, whether economic, social or political, of any society and the agreements cannot go against this order. The Minister has to be able to have recourse to section 98 when he considers that a collective agreement would harm the economic interests of the country, that is, against the public order, and to annul any clause of the collective agreement in such a case;
- secondly, section 98 of the Labour Code does not prevent the promotion and encouragement of arrangements aiming at reaching collective agreements between workers' and employers' organisations; it merely ensures that no clause or collective agreement would do any harm to the economic interests of the country and hence to its public order;
- thirdly, the Director-General of the ILO indicates in his report to the Conference entitled "Democratisation and the ILO" that "only major economic and social considerations or considerations of general interest could justify action by the authorities to alter the content of freely concluded collective agreements", which means that in such a case the public authorities may intervene;
- fourthly, the Committee of Experts requested the Government to persuade the parties to collective bargaining to have regard in their negotiations to major economic and social policy considerations and the general interest invoked by the Government. One may wonder what to do when the parties to the negotitions did not abide by such economic and social policy.
- Should legal rules which are really ethical rules dependent upon the agreement and support of the negotiating parties depend upon public authorities for their enforcement?

Noting the divergence or views between his Government and the Committee of Experts, the speaker wished that this case be submitted to the tribunal, whose establishment had been proposed.

The Employers' members, recalling that the Convention referred to freedom of collective bargaining between employers and workers, observed that this Convention might be applied in different manners, that many systems exist in the world, that in countries where there are various restrictions, collective agreement and collective bargaining are hardly ever as free as they should be. In the case under examination, the question is the general targets of the economic policy of the country. It is certain that the economic situation should be taken into account by the parties to the collective bargaining, but the question concerns the criteria upon which the public authorities may intervene in the collective bargaining. The concepts of public order and the general interest are well known to lawyers, but as long as the collective bargaining is concerned, the prerequisites should be clearly determined so as to avoid arbitrary interventions; the participation of workers and employers in such determination would be desirable. Some measures could be adopted to provide for less interference in the bargaining process and the Government should seek the ways and means to protect its proper interest and objectives without intervening excessively in the collective bargaining and look for solutions compatible with the concept of freedom of collective bargaining.

The Workers' members stated that the Government had not changed and did not have the intention to change its legislation despite the precise and repeated observations of the Committee of Experts. The Government indicated that there was no contradiction between its legislation and the Convention, and instead of cooperating with the supervisory organs, it rather looked for confrontation. Section 98 of the Labour Code permits the intervention in collective bargaining in such a way that it is almost impossible to conclude collective agreements. Such arguments as those which the Government made referring to the economic interests are known, have been discussed many times, and were examined by the Committee of Experts in its General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Barganing of 1983 in which the Committee of Experts indicated that it would be better to try to persuade the parties to collective bargaining to have regard in their negotiations to certain considerations of general interest rather than to restrict and interfere in the collective bargaining. The attitude of the Government is worrying, and goes against the spirit of cooperation. The Workers' members urged that the Government should study again the comments of the Commitee of Experts and the content of the General Survey and that it should reconsider its attitude and re-examine the situation.

A Workers' member of the Netherlands recalled that the Committee of Experts had developed a kind of jurisprudence, giving criteria which the Government should respect if it wanted to interfere in freely negotiated contracts, with an appeal to the economic internomic interest : such criteria included that measures should be temporary, that they should be taken only under exceptional circumstances and that there should be compensation for the living standards of the workers. He noted that it might take quite some time to change laws, as demonstrated in some other cases concerning legislation on interference in free collective bargaining, but he declared such interference intolerable.

The Government representative noted that the Employers' members had said that the interventions in the collective bargaining should not be exaggerated and that the Workers' members had said that they would not accept any interference, and that another workers' member said that the intervention should take place only in exceptional circumstances. The Government does not look for confrontation but looks for collaboration with the ILO. It is a purely judicial question and the Government considers that section 98 of the Labour Code is not against the Convention. Recalling that the interventions were based on national economic interests, the speaker wondered if the parties to the bargaining could, for example, adopt a collective agreement against a governmental decision to freeze the wages to contain inflation. The State enjoys discretionary power in appreciating the risks that run the public or economic order of the country.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government. It understood the Government holds the labour legislation mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report not to be in contravention with the Convention. It also noted the Government's mentioning to seek close cooperation with the ILO. It therefore expressed the hope that the Government, after consultation with the ILO, would reconsider its position.

Convention No. 105: Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1958). A Government representative, Secretary of State for Labour, praised the work of the Committee of Experts which through its comments enabled member States to make the changes and amendments necessary to bring national legislation into conformity with international standards. He indicated that the new Labour Code was promulgated on 29 May 1992. This Labour Code was the result of a tripartite dialogue between Government, workers and employers which made it possible to reach a consensus on the 740 articles of the draft Code presented to the national Congress.

The provisions of this Code were to be applied not only to urban industry but also to agricultural undertakings and agro-industry, thus eliminating the previous distinction made in the Labour Code of 1951. The Labour Code contained provisions concerning the following: prohibition of forced labour, the obligation to pay workers wages in cash and not in the form of vouchers or other payment and the prohibition of employment of children under the age of 14 years. With respect to freedom of association, the new Code recognised the protection of immunity for the founders of trade unions, its leaders and negotiators of collective agreements. Furthermore, the Code included the concept of essential services consistent with the jurisprudence of the Committee of Experts and guaranteed the right to strike by repealing penal sanctions for workers participating in illegal strikes, by reducing the percentage necessary to declare a strike and by permitting strikes not only for economic disputes but also disputes of interests. In this manner the Dominican Republic has harmonised its legislation with ratified Conventions.

As regards Convention No. 105, the General Directorate of Migration continued its work of regularisation of the status of Haitian nationals, especially of those engaged as sugar-cane cutters. He stated that presently 37,765 Haitians were engaged in temporary work for the sugar-cane harvest and processing. Furthermore, 36,180 residents' permits were granted to Haitians living in the country.

Decree No. 233 / 91 was no longer being applied and the General Directorate of Migration had recommenced the work of regularisation called for under Decree No. 417 / 90. Furthermore, given the events taking place in Haiti since October 1991 and the decision of the Organization of American States to isolate the de facto Government of Haiti, the Dominican Republic found itself blocked from reaching an agreement increased the salary of sugar-cane harvesters in 1991-92 by 40 per cent. In order to improve the living and working conditions of sugar-cane workers, particularly as concerns harvesters, the State Sugar Board and the Federation of Sugar Growers provided, in its agreement with the trade unions, for the collaboration between sugar industries and trade unions for the creation of consumer cooperatives which would enable the workers to avoid any abuse attempted by small private merchants.

The Workers' members thanked the Government for the interesting and encouraging information which it provided. They recalled, however, that this case had been discussed for many years now and that, last year, the Office had undertaken a mediation mission.

With respect to the regularisation of the status of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic, they had already noted progress in this regard last year as a result of the adoption of Decree No. 417/90. This year's report of the Committee of Experts, however, had also referred to Decree No. 233/91 concerning the repatriation of foreign workers. This Decree had been implemented in an indiscriminate manner and affected not only men and women of all ages, but also persons born in the Dominican Republic, whether or not in the possession of a resident's permit. Decree No. 233/91 had been applied, in many cases, by means of round-ups in violation of human and employment-related rights. The application of this Decree in fact impeded the process of regularisation which was being implemented under Decree No. 417/90. There were, therefore, two contradictory policies. They urged the Government to take every measure to end this contradiction by ensuring a global policy, affirmed at the highest level, to ensure the application of the relevant standards.

As concerns the hiring procedure for Haitian workers, they understood that the Government of the Dominican Republic had not yet been able to reach an agreement with the Haitian Government. But even in the absence of an intergovernmental agreement, there were measures which could be taken to ensure the application of resolution No. 23/90 concerning the use of intermediaries in the engagement of workers. Having noted the progress made in the adoption of the Labour Code, they added that it would be necessary for a copy of the Code to be communicated to the Office in order to enable the Committee of Experts to fully analyse the new measures with respect to the comments which had been made for many years now.

Finally, they noted the progress made concerning freedom of association but again urged the Government to communicate supplementary information in order to permit a determination of whether, in practice, the guaraantee of freedom of association was truly respected. They concluded by stressing that practical action was necessary to ensure meaningful improvement in working conditions and the living conditions of workers in the Dominican Republic, particularly with respect to the sugar-cane workers.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been a problem for ten years and recalled that in 1983 a Commission of Inquiry had presented a report containing a number of recommendations to be implemented in order to ensure the full application of the Convention. They noted that the mediation mission undertaken in 1991 had resulted in a series of administrative and legislative improvements. Some problems still remained, however, and certain points needed to be clarified.

They recalled that Decree No. 417/90 concerning the regularisation of Haitian nationals affected over 100,000 workers, including Haitians born in the Dominican Republic. This Decree provided the framework, but many texts and detailed regulations would need to be drafted to ensure its effective implementation. They drew attention to Decree No. 233/91 which permitted the repatriation of foreign workers under 16 years of age. The older workers in question had, in many cases, been living and working in the Dominican Republic for decades. Furthermore, in some cases this repatriation was carried out forcibly. They noted the contradiction between these two Decrees and requested the Government to clarify its previous statement by indicating which Decree was no longer in force.

Secondly, they stressed the need to further regularise and control the hiring procedure. They recalled that the draft legislation reviewed in 1991 had made many improvements in the hiring procedure, but stressed that the practical implementation of these was essential. New hiring systems were to be introduced for the 1991-92 sugar-cane harvest. They regretted that there had still been no agreement reached with the Government of Haiti and requested the Government of the Dominican Republic to indicate the methods and procedures presently being used for hiring and the number of persons involved.

Finally, they requested the Government representative to submit in writing to the Office all the information they had provided verbally, including replies to all the questions raised in the Committee of Experts' report. They stressed the need for further information on legislative provisions which had been adopted and on their practical implementation, as well as on supervisory mechanism. They expressed the hope that the progress which had been made would continue and that there would be no need to discuss this case in the future.

A Government member of Haiti, Minister of Social Affairs, noted that Decree No. 233/91 concerning repatriation had had a serious effect on many Haitians, and Haitian children of all ages born in the Dominican Republic, who had been sent over the border without any concern for human rights. The speaker pointed out that this was a very serious problem and largely concerned political difficulties between the two Governments. The Decree, which was adopted unilaterally by the Government of the Dominican Republic, had destabilised the Haitian Government by chasing over 30,000 Haitians and Haitian children into the country during the months of August and September, 1991. Many of them were put on trucks and sent to Haiti without any possibility of appeal. Furthermore, many of those repatriated had been born in the Dominican Republic and despite the guarantees of the Dominican Constitution had not been granted the same rights as Dominican nationals.

Despite the mediation mission undertaken by the ILO, this problem had not been resolved. The mission had first met in the Dominican Republic with high-level governmental officials and this was to be followed by a mission to Haiti. Haiti, however, never received a mission during the period between mid-August and 30 September when the coup d'état occurred. She stated that the Government of President Aristide had expressed every desire to resolve the conflict through dialogue.

Her Government hopes that all the legislative provisions which had been adopted in the Dominican Republic with a view towards resolving this problem would actually be applied. It expressed concern about the problem of the engagement of Haitian workers for the sugar-cane harvest and the difficult relations between trade unions and employers and Government. The speaker expressed the hope that ILO mediation would continue so that the problem of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic could finally be resolved.

The Employers' members, by way of clarification, indicated that their earlier statement with regard to the fact that this case could only be discussed with one country reflected their concern that no reports had been received from the Haitian Government concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. The absence of such information made the discussion of this case slightly unilateral. They recalled that while the Haitian Government often made accustions, the case being discussed today concerned their own population and, in this respect, it too had responsibility to ensure their protection.They had often wondered if the Haitian Government was sufficiently cooperative in this regard. In any event, there was no agreement between the two Governments and this could not be considered the fault of only one of the parties. They urged the Haitian Government to submit a written report so that all views of the situation could be examined.

The Workers' member of the Dominican Republic noted that her country had been called before this Committee for many years on a number of different cases but that unfortunately this year they were only discussing Convention No. 105.

With respect to the declaration made by the Secretary of State for Labour concerning the fundamental changes in the Labour Code, she pointed out that unlike what was said by the Government representative, the evolution in the legal and labour matters was the direct result not only of dialogue and consultation but also of the struggle undertaken by the trade union movement. This was the reason that new labour standards had been adopted which would permit the improvement of industrial relations between workers and employers in the Dominican Republic. She recalled, however, that the Committee on Freedom of Association had noted in its recommendation the difficulties caused by government acts with respect to the trade union activities of the Dominican Electricity Corporation Workers' Trade Union whose leaders had been taken into custody and denied the possibility of exercising trade union activities. The speaker espressed the hope that the Government would correctly apply the new Labour Code and that it would finally resolve the problem of the Electricity Corporation Workers' Trade Union and problems facing workers in the free trade zones.

As concerns Convention No. 105, she pointed out that the situation of workers in the Dominican Republic was regrettable but noted that, as indicated by the Secretary of State, due to various pressures, certain measures had been taken to resolve the situation. Nevertheless, if some progress has already been made, much still needed to be done in order to eradicate a long-existing practice. She expressed the hope that the new labour standards and international legislation would be respected and pointed out that the problems of labour protection for Haitian workers were the same for Dominican workers. As concerned the recognition of trade union activities, she pointed out that some progress had been made and that there was no discrimination in the recognition of trade unions in the sugar-cane industry. Though Haitian workers were members of existing trade unions, the problems referred to had occurred because of the seasonal nature of their work.

With respect to Decree No. 233/91 concerning the repatriation of Haitians, the speaker recognised that abuses had occurred in an indiscriminate and violent manner, but pointed out that this practice had now ended and that repatriation was taking place in a more orderly fashion.

Finally, she stated that, independently of the attempts being made to improve living conditions on the "bateyes", the level of wages for sugar-cane workers was very low, making survival very difficult. She pointed out that the minimum wage for sugar-cane workers had risen to 90 dollars while the cost of a food basket was over 300 dollars. She stated that the problem of forced labour was a national problem which had to be resolved along with the economic problems and expressed the hope that the standard of living would be raised for all workers in the country.

A Workers' member of Greece noted the interventions made by the Government of the Dominican Republic and indicated that the information provided by the Government of Haiti was indispensable to the understanding of the point of view of a neighbouring country whose nationals were often the victims of serious discrimination. He noted that there had been progress but that this progress was quite small. There was no longer the concern of the past for the gathering of workers on trucks and assassinations but rather now it was a question of violent round-ups and expulsions.

He recalled that once a country had ratified a Convention, it undertook to adopt the legislation necessary for its application. But more importantly, it also undertook to effectively ensure the respect of that Convention.

Under Decree No. 233/91 Haitian workers over 60 years of age were repatriated. He was shocked by the fact that a worker having lived and worked in a foreign country and contributed to its economy for years could be repatriated once having reached retirement age without any mention of a right to a pension or concern for whether this worker still had a home in the country of origin. Children under 16 years of age could also be repatriated but there was an absence of information on whether these children were alone, with their parents or born in the territory. The speaker disagreed with the position that every country had the right to expel a foreigner living and working in a territory for an entire lifetime. In his opinion, such a country had the for the hiring of sugar-cane workers with the present Haitian authorities. As a result, for the sugar-cane harvest of 1991-92 hiring had been limited to Hiatian nationals residing in the country and those who had voluntarily crossed the border.

As concerns the protection by the competent authority of the rights and freedoms of workers, the speaker pointed out that various measures had been adopted: (a) an agreement between the State Sugar Board (CEA) and the Federation of Sugar-Growers and various trade unions which associated workers' orgnisations inthe weighing of cane and provided measures to ensure the avoidance of commercial falsification; (b) the continuous and permanent presence of labour inspectors in sugar-cane fields both in the plant3ations of the State Sugar Board and in the private sector; (c) the recognition of new trade unions in the sugar-cane industry both with respect to sugar-cane cutters and weighers invarious plantations; (d) the continuation of social programmes undertaken by the State Sugar Board and (e) the application of sanctions for employers who have violated the Labour Code and other labour standards as well as the registration of violations noted by the Labour Inspectorate.

Efforts were needed in all sectors and all necessary measures would be taken to give effect to this Convention.

Finally, with respect to the protection of wages, according to Tariff 3/92 of December 1991 concluded by the National Wages Board (a tripartite body) the minimum monthly wage for workers in the sugar-cane industry who do not work on plantations had increased by 20 per cent. Moreover, the minimum wage of agricultural workers including sugar-cane workers had increased by 30 per cent. Furthermore, the State Sugar Board had responsibility to provide decent living conditions, even until death in the case of a retired worker. As concerns the children of migrant workers born in the territory, the Government had the same obligations to them as it did to its nationals. After the Second World War, thanks to the action of the trade union movement, migrant workers who were expelled from industrialised countries were granted the same rights as the nationals. National trade unions would certainly react in the same fashion against similar discrimination now, at the end of the twentieth century.

With respect to the increase in wages, he asked the Government to provide further information on the inflation rate in the country and the real purchasing power gained by workers with such a wage increase. As concerns housing of sugar-cane workers by the State Sugar Board, could it indicate the cost of such housing to the worker and the percentage this represented of his salary. Finally, is there a workers' organisation for sugar-cane workers which was able to negotiate with the representatives of the State Sugar Board.

A Government member of Germany welcomed the progress which had been made by the Government but noted that there was still much to be done and many points which needed to be clarified. There appeared to be some divergence of opinion between the General Directorate of Migration and the Labour Department. The General Directorate of Migration appeared to be more powerful, so would the Government representative be able to implement in the Dominican Republic what he had stated orally today. He recalled in this regard that the Directorate of Migration had refused to receive the ILO meditation mission.

He noted the Government's statement concerning a decision by the Organisation of American States calling for minimum contacts with the Haitian Government until its return to democracy. Considering the human aspects of the problem, he wondered whether follow-up contacts between the two Governments could be made, if even at a technical level, and whether such contacts would be in violation of the decision reached by the Organisation of American States.

The Government representative stated that Decree No. 233/91, adopted 13 June 1991, had not been applied since August 1991. Thanks to the ILO's mediation mission, negotiations had been opened between the Government of President Aristides of Haiti and the Government of the Dominican Republic. The negotiations, which had been preceded by a visit of the mediation mission of the ILO to Haiti, had made possible a meeting between the Minister of Social Affairs of Haiti and the Secretary of State for Labour of the Dominican Republic. As a result, repatriations no longer take place under Decree No. 233/91 and the process of regularising the status of Haitians, conforming with Decree No. 417/90 of October 1990, has begun again.

Between December of 1991 and June 1992 – the sugar cane-cutting season – 22,000 workers had been contracted, the majority of which were Haitians: 14,000 were residents of the Dominican Republic and the remainder were frontier workers employed both on state-owned and private plantations.

The sugar-cane workers work under labour standards established in agreements negotiated by the trade unions. The weighing of cane cut by workers is now supervised by inspectors of the Ministry of Labour and inspectors designated by the trade unions. The trade unions were active and authoritative spokespersons recognised by both the Government and the private sugar-cane growers.

The speaker cited, among others, the cases of the trade unions of Corte, Alsa and Tiro de Caña, Porvenir sugar plantation, and San Pedro Macoris, which included amongst their spokespersons and member workers with Haitian nationality, but with Dominican Republic identity documents. He reiterated that this reflected a guarantee of freedom of association, as there was no impediment to workers of Haitian nationality being members of trade unions.

Concerning the intervention by the Workers' member of Greece, the speaker emphasised that with the approval of the new Labour Code and measures taken in sugar-cane plantations, notable progress could be seen as compared to previous years. The wages had increased for workers in urban areas by 30 per cent and that for sugar-cane workers in rural areas by 40 per cent. Annual inflation for 1991 was 4 per cent. These wages were negotiated by a tripartite body and endorsed by the Ministry of Labour. Sugar-cane workers received free lodging as part of their employment.

As concerned the preoccupation relating to contacts the with Haitian authorities, the speaker recalled the decision of the Organisation of American States (OAS) to isolate the current Haitian authorities. Accordingly, his Government would not have any contacts with the current Haitian authorities. The Government of the Dominican Republic continued to recognise President Aristides, whose ambassador remained as designated representative in Santo Domingo. The coup d'état in Haiti was regrettable and the preoccupation expressed by the Minister of Social Affairs in Haiti about Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic was understandable.

In relation to the fact – mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its observation – that the Director of Migration had not received the ILO mediation mission, this official had been replaced. Six thousand persons (of a total of 1,000,000 Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic) had been repatriated and many of these persons had left voluntarily. Those who were repatriated were transported by bus and food had been distributed to persons affected.

The speaker stated in conclusion that thanks to the ILO mediation mission, Decree No. 233/91 had ceased to be applied; the programme of regularisation – in conformity with Decree No. 417/90 – of the status of Haitian workers resident in the Dominican Republic had been reinstated; temporary work permits had been issued to cane cutters and other temporary workers, and arrangements had been made for temporary residence permits for Haitian nationals residing in the country.

The speaker gave to the secretariat relevant documentation and the new Labour Code.

The Workers' members emphasised that the clarifications and responses provided by the Secretary of State showed how important the Committee of Experts' request for more precise infromation on the application of the various Decrees had been. As Decree No. 413/90 was still given effect according to the secretary, more information was needed on its application. The statement that Decree No. 233/91 had not been applied for months should also be confirmed by the Government in writing; examination of the new Labour Code should also be made possible.

The Employers' members declared themselves in full agreement with the Workers. Complete information should be confirmed and set out in writing, the new Labour Code should be communicated and responses should be made to the Committee of Experts so that, if necessary, the present Committee could examine the situation again next year.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government, in particular concerning the adoption and coming into force of the new Labour Code. It was satisfied to note the progress having been made on different points made in the Committee of Experts' report, but doubted whether such progress on the regulations on the status of Haitian workers was sufficient. It therefore urged the Government, in view of the fact that this matter had been pending for years, to regulate that status as soon as possible, in conformity with the relevant Conventions of the ILO and hoped to be able to conclude at its next session that this goal had been reached.

Iraq (ratification: 1959). A Government representative stated that his Government has examined the observations made by the Committee of Experts. He noted that the Committee had read section 87 of the Iraqi Penal Code and Law No. 104 of 1981 on the State Organisation for Social Reform governing prison work as laying down the obligation to work as an essential corollary of the prison sentence which were contrary to the provisions of the Convention. He stated that neither section 87 of the Penal Code nor Law No. 104 of 1981 provide for forced labour on the part of prisoners. Prison work was part of the process of rehabilitation of the prisoners in conformity with the United Nations Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Detainees (1955), a copy of which document was sent to the Committee of Experts. The practical application of Law No. 104 of 1981 and the regulations related to it clearly showed, in his view, that work performed by prisoners was not only compulsory and that they had the right to choose the kind of work they wanted according to their qualifications. This work was governed by the Iraqi Labour laws for such questions as hours of work, wages, rest periods, social security and coverage for occupational injury and the like. Referring to possible ambiguities in the language of section 19 of the Law No. 104 of 1981 he stated that instructions for its application were however clear as to the voluntary nature of the work. On the recommendation of a national committee set up to study the Committee of Experts' comments, draft amendments to section 19 had been submitted to the competent legislative authorities and that a copy of the amended law would be transmitted to the ILO when adopted. This Committee, he said, also included representatives of the social partners. Referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the imposition of sanctions for breach of labour discipline and participation in strikes, he said that the draft amendments to section 19 of the Law No. 104 of 1981 will ensure that work done by workers or prisoners would not, in any way, be compulsory. With regard to Resolution No. 521 of 1983 and Resolution No. 552 of 1986 of the Revolutionary Command Council he stated that these Resolutions were issued in the exceptional circumstances of the long war that had lasted ten years. Certain restrictions placed on the right of civil servants and employees in the public sector to leave their work were done in the context of the special needs that existed in the country at the time. He said these Resolutions were repealed based on the new direction taken by the country and taking into account the comments made by this Committee last year. He said copies of the repealing decisions and resolutions will be provided to the ILO.

The Workers' members stressed the importance of this case as it concerned human rights and recalled that this Committee had devoted considerable attention to it in the past. They regretted to note once again that a Government representative repeated statements made earlier to the Conference Committee in 1990 and 1991. They referred to this year's report of the Committee of Experts where the Government's failure to reply to the points raised by them was clearly stated. They were perplexed by the Government representative's statement that the Committee of Experts has misread and misunderstood the relevant laws but that this would be removed by the adoption of the proposed amendments. They were further puzzled by the Government representative's statement that prisoners had to observe the rules laid down by penal authorities but that the work they did in prison was not compulsory. Unless prisons in Iraq were unique they were sceptical about the voluntary nature of prison labour in this context. They requested the Government representative to clarify if sections 197 (4) and 216 of the Penal Code, under which imprisonment with a work obligation with a fixed term or life may be imposed in cases where activities are stopped or disrupted in public services or bodies, were clearly repealed. In this regard they recalled the Government had indicated in earlier reports that state officials and employees of government establishments had no right to strike; that section 197 (4) applied without qualification and made no distinction between essential and non-essential services provided by the undertakings, and a threat of imprisonment for disruption of work was intended to induce the continuation of work by anyone who would otherwise abandon it and thus disrupt the services in question. In view of the fact that this was a continuing case of serious violations of the Convention and considering the fact that the Government had consistently said it was in the process of changing the laws they felt obliged to request the Government to provide solid reassurances on the time scales for such changes in order to avoid repetition of previous discussions on this case in future sessions of this Committee. In the absence of clarifications regarding the legal situation, they were bound to believe forced labour continued to exist in Iraq.

The Employers' members expressed their agreement with the views of the Workers' members regarding the statement made by the Government representative. It seemed to them the Government was not aware of the contents of Article 1 of the Convention which requires all Members which ratify the Convention to undertake to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour. Having heard the statement of the Government representative, which referred to amendments that were to be made to the laws to eliminate all ambiguities concerning the compulsory nature of prison work, the Employers' members were convinced that the obligation to work in prisons continued to exist as far as prisoners were concerned. Taking into account the statement by the Government representative that prison labour was aimed at rehabilitation, they wished to know what would happen if prisoners refused to work and if there would be any measures taken against them. In light of these considerations, they felt it was necessary that the Committee of Experts examine the relevant amending texts after their adoption with a view to ensuring their conformity with the Convention. They strongly felt that this case called out for urgent solutions and requested the Government to take the necessary measures, as soon as possible, to eliminate the discrepancies of the national legislation with the Convention. The Government representative considered that he had provided the clarifications and information requsted by the Experts in their report. With regard to the United Nations Minimum Rules For the Treatment of Detainees of 1955, he indicated that the penal system in Iraq was not different than other penal systems around the world which aimed at rehabilitating and reforming prisoners with a view to making them constructive members of society. He reiterated that the provisions of Law No. 104 of 1981 clearly provided that work by prisoners be voluntary and that those who refused to work would not be punished in any way. In addition, they were given a choice of types of work they wanted. In view of the ambiguous language of section 19 of the above-mentioned Law and the confusion that may have resulted from it, the Government representative stated that this section would be amended to eliminate all doubts. He stated that the resolutions providing for the imprisonment of resigning officials was repealed and the texts repealing these resolutions would be made available to the Committee of Experts as soon as possible.

The Workers' members, referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts that the Government's report tended to repeat earlier statements, considered the Government representative should, in his reply, address the substance of these comments, as well as the remarks and questions made by the Employers' and Workers' members. They noted that the Government representative had not yet given precise indications regarding the time frame for the proposed amendments and only stated that the above-mentioned resolutions were indeed repealed. If the Government representative did not wish to reply, that would be duly noted by this Committee.

The Government representative stated that he could provide this Committee with a copy of the resolution of the Revolutionary Command Council that repealed the resolution on the imprisonment of resigning officials and that he would also transmit the other texts repealing the resolutions which were the subject of criticism by the Committee of Experts. He pointed out that any legislative reform takes time but he was authorised to state that serious measures to amend the national legislation had been taken and that other measures would be submitted to the national assembly. Copies of the draft amendments will be communicated as soon as possible.

The Workers' members insisted that this Committee, in its conclusions, should note, in strong language, the absence of the required information relating to the problems raised.

The Committee noted with concern the information provided by the Government representative. It felt that this information was mostly a reiteration of earlier communications and did not contain the full information the Committee of Experts had requested. It strongly urged the Government to send copies of the draft amendments intended to modify existing legislation, as well as all other relevant documents in order for the Committee to make a full assessment of the measures taken or envisaged and to discuss the problems raised at its next session.

The Government representative expressed his disagreement with that part of the conclusion which referred to most of the information supplied by his Government as being a repetition of previous statements.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (ratification : 1961). The Government has supplied the following information :

Act No. 5 of 1991 on the application of the principles of the Green Book, Act No. 20 of 1991 on the promotion of freedom and the Green Book proclaim the right of each citizen to freely express his opinion, and prohibits punishment which affects human dignity such as forced labour and long-term imprisonment. Section 2 of Act No. 5 of 1991 provides that the amendments of the legislation provided for under the preceding section must be amendments of the legislation provided for under the preceding section must be drawn up within a period of one year from the date of publication of the Act. Thus all the provisions of the 1972 Publications Act and the Penal Code shall be amended to bring them into accordance with Acts Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991.

The orders of the Higher Council of the Revolution and those concerning the trial of those responsible for corruption, the texts of which the Committee of Experts have requested, were adopted at the beginning of the revolution to resolve certain problems relating to the circumstances. Their operation ended when the problems referred to disappeared. They became null and void subsequent to the promulgation of Acts Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information communicated by the Government, with regard to the request of the Committee of Experts for copies of the Orders of the Higher Council of the Revolution respecting the defence of the revolution and the judgement of those responsible for political and administrative corruption, these Orders were adopted at the beginning of the revolution only to deal with a unique situation that existed at the time. That situation no longer exists and since the adoption of Law No. 5 of 1991 on the application of the Green Book on human rights these Orders were longer in force.

The Workers' members stated that it was difficult to make an accurate assessment of the situation on such an important Convention in the absence of texts of the laws and orders. They took due note of the oral and written information provided by the Government. They further noted that Laws Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991 provided for the possibility of amending the Publications Act of 1972 and several sections of the Penal Code as well as making Orders of the Higher Council of the Revolution null and void. They understood the problems faced by the Government in reporting on the application of Conventions. They hoped, however, that the Government representative would convey to his Government the concern of the Conference Committee about the delays experienced in providing information to the Committee of Experts. They strongly urged the Government to provide the required information to the Committee of Experts at its next session including the texts of laws Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991 as well as amendments to the Publications Act of 1972 and the relevant sections of the Penal Code in order to ensure that full conformity of national legislation with the Convention would soon be attained.

The Employers' members regretted to note that no concrete proof of the changes requested by the Committee of Experts had been provided for several years. They noted that the Government had for many years given indications and promises of change, including a reference to the formation of a tripartite national committee to look into these problems. The texts of such changes as well as the copies of the Green Book on human rights and the Orders of the Higher Council of the Revolution had yet to be received by the Committee of Experts. They now understood from the Government's oral and written information that these Orders were no longer in force. In view of the fact that there was no verifiable information on the legal and practical situation in the country, they were obliged to assume that it remained unchanged and thus continued to be at variance with the provisions of the Convention. They felt that the Government should be urgently requested to clearly state in writing the laws it intended to amend and the timeframe for these amendments.

The Government representative, referring to the absence of the texts of Laws Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991 as well as a copy of the Green Book, stated that his Government had sent copies of all of them to the ILO and failed to see any explanation for their disappearance. He disagreed that there were bureaucratic difficulties in his country which hindered the timely supply of reports on the application of Conventions. It was true that the various departments concerned would normally be consulted in the preparation of reports in response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts without giving rise to any particular problems. He reiterated that amendments to the Publications Act of 1972 and the relevant sections of the Penal Code would be introduced in conformity with Laws Nos. 5 and 20 of 1991.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government, including the steps it seemed to have taken to amend the laws referred to by the Committee of Experts. It further noted that the Government attributed delays in reporting to the current political situation in and arround the country. It recalled, however, that this question had been under discussion for several years during which period reports had not been sent on time. Under these circumstances, the Committee felt it was not in a position to discuss this matter in detail at this session. It therefore urged the Government to send detailed reports as soon as possible to enable this Committee to fully discuss the situation in a future session.

Morocco (ratification: 1966). A Government representative indicated that the provisions of Section 5 of Decree No. 2-57-1465 of 8 February 1968 to which the Committee of Experts referred to in its observation were not at all incompatible with the Convention; these provisions merely followed the well-known administrative law principle of continuity in the public service. As for the right to strike it was not only guaranteed by article 14 of the Constitution but this right was in fact exercised as was proved by the general strikes in the public health and teaching sectors of 13 and 25 February 1992 which did not lead to the imposition of any sanctions on those who had participated in them. The reference to the events of 1979 and 1981 which figured in the observation of the Committee of Experts did not require any comment to the extent that this point which did not concern forced labour was already examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association to which all the useful information had been communicated. This problem was in any case practically resolved by the reintegration of all the dismissed persons.

The Workers' members considered that the explanations of the Government representative were insufficient. The Committee of Experts started off in its observation by noting that the Government had not provided a report on the application of this Convention. It was indispensable that such a report be sent. The Committee of Experts then noted that the Government had not provided a reply to the observations of the two Worker unions on the same Convention. Document D10 only indicated that the information received by the Government exclusively concerned the direct request addressed to it, which was of little interest for this Committee. However, a Decree existed which provided that "any coordinated stoppage of work, any collective act of indiscipline may be punished without regard to the guarantees respecting discipline". The Committee of Experts wished to examine the application of this Decree in order to evaluate to what extent it could be used to force employees and public servants to work during a strike. But this Committee could only examine this point when all the relevant information had been communicated to the Committee of Experts which should be done without delay.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' members. The Committee of Experts' report contained general allegations and it was indispensable to know whether there was any basis in fact for these allegations. Rather than referring to a case brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Government should start a dialogue with the Committee of Experts and this Committee and provide information that supported its perspective. The Committee of Experts would then be in a position to make an observation as to whether or not the position taken by the Government constituted a violation of the Convention. It was therefore up to this Committee to urge the Government to provide all the necessary information.

A Workers' member of Spain referred to the detention of two trade union leaders and wished to know if they were going to be judged under the Dahir of 24 February 1958 to which the Committee of Experts referred to in its observation.

The Government representative considered that, regarding judicial proceedings against the General Secretary of the Democratic Confederation of Labour (CDT), this question was outside the scope of the present Committee's competence. A complaint had been lodged on this matter before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government would reply to this complaint in conformity with the relevant procedure.

A Workers' member of Morocco noted that to the extent that the Government representative had refered to the strikes of 1979 and 1981 it would be appropriate to emphasise that these events continued to have consequences. In the health sector notably, the problems had not been resolved. The Government violated international labour Conventions as well as the constitution of its country which guaranteed the right to strike in the private and public sectors.

A Workers' member of the United Kingdom recalled that in paragraph 126 of its General Survey of 1979 on the Abolition of Forced Labour, the Committee of Experts stated that "a suspension of the right to strike, enforced by sanctions involving compulsory work, is compatible with the Convention only in so far as it is necessary to cope with cases of force majeure".

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government in noting from the report of the Committee of Experts that no communication from the Government had been received by that Committee. The Conference Committee urged the Government to send a full report on the points raised by the Committee of Experts in the very near future in order that the Committee could assess the situation fully.

Pakistan (ratification: 1960). A Government representative noted that the points raised under this Convention concerned compulsory prison labour. He indicated that any legislation which fell strictly within the purview of the Convention and which provided for compulsory prison labour should be repealed. In such cases, simple imprisonment should be the penalty. Compulsory labour provided in cases not covered under the five clauses in the Convention could, however, remain. The speaker expressed the opinion that the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the prohibition of the publication of certain views was not covered by the Convention. With reference to the Bill to amend the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance of 1963, the speaker confirmed that this Bill had lapsed as it had not been laid before the National Assembly within the four months required under the Constitution. The Ministry of Information indicated that if any provisions of this Bill were in violation of the Convention they should be deleted. The draft provided to the Office, however, contained no provision about compulsory labour. The Bill would be put before the National Assembly again, however, and would not contain any provision about compulsory labour. He pointed out, however, that the Publications Ordinance of 1963 only provided for compulsory labour in the case where a newspaper was operated without having obtained the necessary declaration from the Government. This had nothing to do with the expression of a political opinion. In such instances, persons were only punished with compulsory labour for having violated a simple law to obtain a declaration prior to starting a newspaper. The Convention, however, only prohibited compulsory labour with respect to political opinion. He added that any legislation which actually provided for compulsory labour for the expression of a political opinion should clearly be repealsed as it would be in violation of the Convention. As concerns the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 and the Political Parties Act, 1962, the speaker agreed that any compulsory labour provided as a punishment in these Acts should be repealed, to the extent that they contravene the provisions of the Convention. The speaker asserted that the Anti-Islamic Activities of Quadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahamadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance No. XX of 1984 did not concern religious discrimination. The only objective of the Act was to ensure that the religious feelings of others were not hurt. Persons attacking Christianity, Judaism and Hinduism would also be punished. He referred to the particular sects covered by the Ordinance and indicated that they offended the Muslims by attacking their prophet and calling themselves Muslims while believing that their leader was a prophet. These were concerns of national sovereignty and were in no way covered by the Convention. Finally, the speaker expressed his opinion that the information noted by the Committee of Experts provided in the report of the Special Rapporteur on the Application of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Conviction had nothing to do with the Convention.

The Employers' members noted that the most important point made by the Government was that, if there was any provision of compulsory labour under the five instances covered by the Convention, then such legislation should be amended. The commitment made by the Government should find concrete form in the necessary legislation for adoption as soon as possible, including the Bills which had lapsed. They noted the indication made by the Government that the legislation on press and publications only concerned the administrative question of obtaining a permit in order to run a newspaper. The effect that this new information would have upon the application of the Convention would have to be reviewed by the Committee of Experts and the relevant legislation should be sent to it for examination. They noted the Government's recognition that any provisions for compulsory labour in the Industrial Relations Ordinance or the Merchant Shipping Act were contrary to the Convention and should be repealed as soon as possible. They considered that the question of religious discrimination involved a great deal of subjectivity and requested that the Government supply as much information as possible to the Office so that a thorough assessment could be made of the situation.

The Workers' members thanked the Government for the information it provided and noted that there was perhaps the possibility of advancement wth respect to the application of this Convention. This case had been discussed in the Committee since 1980 and several special paragraphs had been applied to it. It was essential that the intentions expressed by the Government be transformed into concrete action, in particular the adoption of the necessary legislative amendments. Bills containing the necessary amendments to the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, the Industrial Relations Ordinance, the Industrial Relations Ordinance and the Merchant Shipping Act had to be adopted in order to ensure conformity with the Convention. The necessary measures should be taken in the very near future and the relevant texts sent to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts. As concern religious freedom, the Government continued to insist that this freedom exists and that no forced labour is used as a means of religious discrimination. The Committee of Experts' report on the other hand provided certain information from the Human Rights Commission which tended to prove the contrary. Detailed information from the Government replying to the allegations made in the report of the Human Rights Commission would be necessary for a full assessment by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Convention. They hoped that progress could be made in the near future.

The Workers' member of Pakistan welcome the indication made by the Government representative that the Merchant Shipping Act and the Industrial Relations Ordinance would be brought into conformity with the Convention. They suggested that the Government consider the possibility of technical assistance from the Office in order to help it bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention. He added that, as concerns religious freedom, the trade union movement in Pakistan consisted of members from all religions and their interests were defended equally. All religions should be respected and should respect each other in order to ensure the religious tolerance necessary for stable and healthy society.

A Workers' member of the United States noted that this was a classic case in which assistance from the ILO could help to find a solution to the differences of opinion concerning the application of the Convention. The Government had expressed good will to bring its situation into conformity with the Convention. They hoped that the Government would consider technical assistance in this regard.

The Government representative stated that his Government could ensure the application of this Convention by itself and would not require technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government including its undertaking to change the existing legislation in so far as it was in contravention with the Convention. In welcoming this willingness, the Committee reminded the Government that the Committee of Experts had raised other points than those which the Government would reconsider its position on these other points also and would send a report with full particulars, including a copy of the drafts changing the relevant legislation, as soon as possible.

Peru (ratification: 1960). A Government representative acknowledged the observation of the Committee of Experts expressing satisfaction with the repeal, by provisions drafted for the new Penal Code, of the provisions which permitted judges, in cases where offences were committed by "savages", to replace sentences of imprisonment by assignment to a penal agricultural colony for an unspecified period of up to 20 years. This was an important step in the history of his country.

The Workers' and Employers' members stated that there was clear progress – in law – in application of this Convention which had been the subject of discussion since 1980 following the repeal of the former article 44 of the Penal Code. They hoped this Convention would be fully applied in practice in the future.

Sudan (ratification: 1970). A Government representative, in reference to the point made by the Committee of Experts on the suspension of the Constitution, stated that the Constitution was suspended by the National Salvation Government in June 1989 in accordance with Provisional Constitutional Decree No. 1. This Decree proclaimed a state of emergency which was required in his country due to an armed conflict in vast areas in the south and the west. In addition to the political instability, there were also other factors such as the drought and refugee movements. The state of emergency was necessary to bring back peace and security and public order and to initiate the recovery of the nation. He affirmed that the state of emergency had been partially lifted as conditions improved and that it would be totally lifted soon. The National Salvation Government was attempting to set up a system based on democracy and free popular participation through elections. These new grass-root elections had been started in provinces which held their own conferences which in turn were held to elect representatives in a totally free manner up to the highest legislative authority in the country. This authority would soon prepare the Constitution and the legislation of the country. With regard to Constitutional Decree No. 2 of 1989, which dissolved political parties and initiated other measures to reinstall public order in the country, the speaker indicated that any Government attempting to consolidate power would have needed to adopt such a decree. Moreover, the National Salvation Government had also striven to reconstitute the legislative and executive authorities and the trade unions. The delegation of trade unions had continued to participate in the ILO since the revolution. The trade unions had also participated in the preparation of the labour law of 1992 which respected international labour standards. This Labour Code was sent to the ILO in a letter dated 9 April 1992. According to this new Labour Code, the trade union movement in Sudan was preparing its elections which would start in the various regions of Sudan around August 1992. The speaker indicated that his country would welcome any representative of the ILO to be present at the elections of the trade unions as an observer in order to see the legality of these elections. The speaker further added that his Government had released all political prisoners who had been taken since April 1991. Both the ILO and the United Nations Human Rights Commission had been informed of this in February 1992. There were no political prisoners in Sudan now, only those who had been accused and found guilty of offences. The Industrial Relations Act of 1976 referred to by the Committee of Experts, was being reconsidered in order to ensure its compatibility with ILO standards especially with regard to arbitration and the right of the Minister to send any dispute to arbitration without consultations with the parties concerned. This right, however, was only exercised in the case of essential services whose stoppage could damage the health and security of the population. The speaker finally assured the Committee that his Government would take full account of what was said by it and by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members recalled that, in the view of the Experts, there were a number of provisions which were at variance with Sudan's obligations under the Convention. The cause of this was a state of emergency in the country which had begun in 1987 and which was extended in 1989 and which led to considerable restrictions in many areas, including labour relations. Considerable penalties, including forced labour, in the event of infringements of the prohibitions under the state of emergency, were imposed by the Government. Although the Government representative had suggested that there had been a gradual relaxation of the state of emergency and that a new labour law was being drafted which would introduce important changes in the area of labour relations, it was clear that, at the moment, labour relations were considerably impaired. The Employers' members expressed their regret at the present situation and hoped for a change at the earliest possible moment.

The Workers' members considered it important to state that the nature and duration of measures taken in an emergency such as the suppression of fundamental freedom and rights, if enforced by sanctions involving forced labour, should be strictly limited to circumstances where the life, safety and health of the population were endangered. The Workers' members referred to the point of the Committee of Experts' observation concerning the provision under the Industrial Relations Act of 1976 which provided that participation in strikes was punishable with imprisonment involving compulsory labour whenever the Minister decided to imprisonment involving compulsory labour whenever the Minister decided to submit the dispute to compulsory arbitration. They felt that the Government should give full details to the Committee of Experts in its report in this respect. Although the Committee of Experts admitted that referral to compulsory arbitration was admissible in essential services, the interruption of which would endanger the safety and health of the population, it stated, however, that, according to the text of the the Act itself, compulsory arbitration could be deemed "necessary" under the Act in a much wider range of circumstances than was envisaged under the Convention. It would be appropriate if the Government gave full details to the Committee of Experts since the issue of what was meant by "essential services" was a very delicate matter and the Government could use this as an argument for exceptions under the terms of the Convention. Morever, the Committee of Experts had stated that the Constitutional Decree No. 2 of 1989 imposed a prohibition on any strike save by special permission. What was not clear was whether this Decree had been repealed by the text of the Labour Act that was submitted to ILO in a letter of early 1992. The Workers' members wanted to know whether this Labour Act was indeed in operation or whether it was just a draft Bill.

The Workers' member of Sudan indicated that the Labour Act of 1992 had come into force on 20 February 1992. He confirmed that Workers' representatives had participated in the drafting of that Labour Act. The draft bill was placed before a tripartite commission and it went through the usual procedure and ended up with the authorities who took the final decision. The speaker further referred to figures of surplus grain production which he stated were a pretty conclusive demonstration of the fact that there was no forced labour since such high figures could not be achieved in those circumstances. Moreover, in Sudan the whole population mobilised itself in situations of natural catastrophe and those volunteers who lent a hand received a certain quantity of compensation in kind.

The Government representative assured the Committee that the 1977 Labour Act was actually a law in force. He appreciated the intervention of the Employers' members, expressing hope that the state of emergency would soon be lifted and assured the Committee that his Government was working very hard to attain this objective. With regard to the Industrial Relations Act of 1976, the question as to the exact definition of what was essential and what was not would be communicated by his Government to the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government which referred to the political unrest and the state of emergency existing in the country. The Committee recalled first of all that the state of emergency was in force already for more than ten years. It pointed out that, under the Convention, the nature and duration of the measures taken in an emergency, if enforced by sanctions involving compulsory labour, should be strictly limited to what was considered absolutely indispensable to cope with real and immediate circumstances endangering the life, safety or health of the population. It urged the Government to consider its position on these points and report full particulars to the ILO in the very near future.

United Republic of Tanzania (ratification: 1962). See the statement of the Government representative concerning the application of the Convention under Convention No. 29.

In addition the Workers' members observed that the Government had indicated in the Conference Committee in 1991 that interministerial consultations were going on in view of the modification of several legislative provisions, affecting the application of the Convention, but that the Government had so far not communicated information for examination by the Committee of Experts. Since the Government representative stated that the text of the drafts had been sent to the Office two months ago, they hoped that the conclusions adopted in the case of Convention No. 29 would be brought before this Committee.

The Employers' members emphasised the importance of the problems raised by the Committee of Experts in relation to the application of Convention No. 105, concerning provisions related to the Press, to labour discipline and to strikes. They considered that the explanations supplied on this subject by the Government representative were vague. The Committee should repeat the conclusions formulated earlier and discuss this this case the following year, after the Committee of Experts have examined draft texts to be communicated by the Government.

The Committee took due note of the information supplied by the Government. It felt distressed at the lack of progress that had been made on the subject-matter which had been discussed by the Committee for very many years. It understood that the amending of the Constitution delayed the materials of the intentions of the Government to change the laws in question. It also noted that a Bill to change those laws will be tabled before Parliament during its next session, which will start next spring. It strongly urged the Government to take all measures to bring that Bill before Parliament as soon as possible, and to send a copy of the same to the ILO at the same time, in order that the Committee could make a further assessment of the situation at its next session.

Thailand (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that the Anti-Communist Activities Act of 1952 was adopted to protect the democratic system of the country suitable to its socio-economic development. The penalty of imprisonment in the Act was considered necessary to prevent any activity which would endanger the peace and security of the nation and the people; only those have been imprisoned who were proven to have been engaged in actions to bring about disasters to the nation or the people. Policies Nos. 66/23 and 65/25 were adopted to eliminate conflicts between the pro-communist activists and the Government with a view to creating a peaceful situation in the country; as a result of these measures a great number of pro-communists have surrendered to the Government, which has provided them with help, and the number of pro-communists have decreased considerably. The Act for the Prevention of Desertion or Undue Absence from Merchant Ships has never been promulgated. An investigation will be made to determine the reason for this misunderstanding and the Government will report to the ILO shortly. The Government has never prosecuted any person under sections 131 and 133 of the Labour Relations Act cited by the speaker. Section 117 of the Penal Code of Thailand, the aim of which is to ensure the security within the Kingdom, is used in practice in respect of persons whose intentions is to overthrow the Government unconstitutionally.

Concerning the prohibition of strikes and similar actions in the state enterprises, the Government representative declared that state enterprises are different from private enterprises in structures as well as in purpose as they are state-owned, subsidised, accorded tax exemption and, sometimes, monopoly control. It is necessary for the Government to protect public services whose interruption may affect the economy of the country and cause hardship to the people; hence, the imposition of penalties of imprisonment for any person who stages a strike is an important instrument to prevent damages to the public. However, since the enactment of the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act, there has never been a strike. The Government representative corrected the wording of section 45 of the Act which should read as follows: "Any person who incites, or aids and abets the commission of the offence under paragraph 1 shall be liable to twice the penalty prescribed therein".

The Employers' members stated that provisions imposing penalties because of a political opinion constitute a clear violation of the Convention, and that they were in agreement with the Committee of Experts on this point. As to the Act for the Prevention of Desertion from Merchant Ships the Government indicated that the whole of its shipping legislation will be revised and that changes may be expected in this respect. Concerning violation of labour discipline and participation in strikes in certain enterprises, both these actions can be punished with imprisonment or forced labour. On these questions the Experts recalled their restrictive definition of the essential services where prohibition of strikes is acceptable. The Employers' members reiterated their opposition to this criteria both in terms of substance and its sources. One cannot accept that endangering of even only one life should not be considered important or sufficient; why then should the criteria be based on endangering a "part of the population"? It may well be that the Government would want to protect some values, material or not, by restricting the right to strike. As for political strikes, it may well be that the Government wants to suppress certain political activities in this particular way; the governments should not have recourse to such drastic measures to avoid being overthrown. On the other hand, the Employers' members cannot accept that a political strike should be exonerated from all forms of sanctions just because they were called or stamped a simple strike; political strikes did not benefit from any particular protection under the ILO Conventions. Finally, nothing justifies that state enterprises should be treated differently from private enterprises simply because they belong to the State. If there are no other reasons, an absolute prohibition of strikes in the state enterprises is not acceptable.

The Workers' members stated that they were generally in agreement with the Employers' members, pointing out that the Government representative said nothing different from the observations of the Committee of Experts. The speaker stated that the Government had taken either no action or insufficient action with regard to the obsevations of the Committee of Experts on the anti-communist acttivities. Certain state enterprises which are referred to here concern services that are obviously not essential: tobacco industry, dairy production, leather-making.

A Government member of Japan underlined that the report of the Committee of Experts this year contained a new element concerning the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act. The Experts are right on this point. This Act should be considered in a wider perspective and, in particular, in relation to the complaints presented in this respect to the Committee on Freedom of Association which note with great concern the numerous and insidious incompatibilities with the principles of freedom of association, including automatic dissolution of existing unions in state enterprises, restriction on the establishment and the functioning of the associations intended to replace them, limitation of the free collective bargaining; the Committee urged the Government to repeal the Act and to restore the position of the trade unions which had been dissolved and to return their assets to them. The speaker expressed strong hope that the Government would take necessary steps to comply with the unanimous recommendation of the Governing Body.

A Workers' member of Pakistan fully supported the view of the previous speakers recalling that the exclusion of the workers of state enterprises from the right to strike constitutes equally a violation of Convention No 87. This was particularly stressed at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference by the workers who requested the repeal of this Act. The speaker has repeated this demand before the Committee.

The Government representative, thanking the speakers for their interesting observations, declared that account should be taken of the conditions prevailing in her country. The Government will be informed of the discussion in this Committee and a report will be supplied.

A Workers' member of Greece stated that the conclusions of the Committee should be worded in a manner to bind an eventual new Government so that this Committee should not start the debate afresh; all the interventions and the report published by the IFFTU show that the situation in Thailand is far from being brilliant.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government which it considered not to be sufficient. It repeated its view that the abolition of forced labour is a very serious matter. The Committee strongly urged the Government to take, without any delay, all necessary measures to amend the legislation in order to bring it into complete conformity with the Convention and supply full particulars on this legislation to the ILO in the very near future.

Convention No. 106: Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices), 1957

Kuwait (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that temporary workers employed for a period of less than six months do have, in practice, weekly rest.

The Employers' members noted that the exclusion from the Labour Law of 1964 concerned not only temporary workers with less than six months' employment but also workers in enterprises employing fewer than five persons, and that the case had been discussed for some years. Observing that there was no question of the Convention, they asked why the Government did not adjust the legislation, if a weekly rest period was in practice guaranteed.

The Workers' members also stated that the legislation should be changed to comply with the Convention. They requested clarification as to whether the draft Labour Code mentioned earlier by the Government representative covered this issue. They stressed the importance of weekly rest for workers and stated that the principle could not differ because of the size of an enterprise or of the temporary nature of employment. They pointed out that, because many of the temporary workers are from foreign countries, the issue of temporary workers was a matter of migrant workers.

The Government representative stated that, even though the Labour Law provides for the exception of temporary workers with less than 6 months' employment, it is not logical to expect workers to continue working for 6 months without rest, and that Friday is a day off in the country for religious reasons. He confirmed that the draft law in question provides for a weekly rest period of 24 consecutive hours for all the workers.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It understood that the changing of the Labour Law in the private sector had been drafted. It invited the Government to send a copy of the draft to the ILO at its earliest convenience in order that the Committee of Experts can make a full assessment of the steps having been taken to bring the legislation into complete conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Chile (ratification: 1971). A Government representative, the Under Secretary of Social Welfare, stated that this Government recognised the facts mentioned in point No. 1 of the Committee of Experts' observations. In 1991 a draft law had been placed before the National Congress to rectify the situation of workers dismissed for political reasons under the military regime; this draft was being debated in the Chamber of Deputies. The draft provided special benefits for workers dismissed for political reasons, including the possibility of early retirement in certain circumstances; an improved calculation of the qualification period for acquiring the right to a pension; the right to obtain a pension at 65 without being in permanent employment; and facilities for obtaining an ex gratia pension. An agreement had been reached on 6 June 1992 between the Government and the Comando de Exonerados de Chile aimed at a substantial improvement of the content of the draft law currently under discussion. Under the agreement, persons dismissed for political reasons would have a right to new improvements in pensions granted to them together with the opportunity to increase their amount. Access to pensions would be considered together with means for easing reintegration of workers dismissed from the public service and improved access to opportunities for vocational training and small-scale enterprises. Tens of thousands would benefit from the draft law, by which the Government was seeking to compensate for the economic disadvantages and moral injury suffered by workers who had been dismissed for political reasons. It should be emphasised that since 10 March 1990 there had been no case of dismissal for political reasons.

The Employers' members reviewed the Committee of Experts' observations and welcomed the positive information contained in it as well as the statement of the Government representative. They were fully confident tht the compensation referred to by the Committee of Experts would be granted by the draft legislation mentioned. As concerned the powers of rectors of the universities to impose disciplinary sanctions for political reasons, it was desirable that such provisions should be repealed and it was hoped that the repeal, if not already carried through, would be effected as soon as possible.

The Workers' members approved of the progress reported, but pointed out that the Government was announcing measures already announced last year. They sought more precise data as to implementation of the measures announced; they urged the Government to take all necessary steps promptly.

The Government representative, indicated that the agreement between his Government and the Comando de Exonerados de Chile was a concrete fact to be adopted in legal form by the National Congress. This new agreement demonstrated a desire for dialogue and concerted action. The Government would provide information of the Committee of Experts' third point 3 in its next report.

The Committee noted with interest the information supplied by the Government. It welcomed the progress attained on the points raised by the Committee of Experts, notably the submission to the National Congress of a Bill to amend existing legislation. The Committee hoped to be in a position, at one of its next meetings, to conclude that legislation and practice were in complete conformity with the Convention.

Cuba (ratification: 1965). The Government communicated the following information:

1. As concerns the comments of the ICFTU, the Government furnished the following information:

The Ministries of Education and Higher Education have undertaken studies with a view to redefining the information which must be contained in the student's school records with a view to removing from this record elements which do not involve academic matters and the interests of the student. Once this study is completed, consultations will take place with student organisations, trade unions and the administration of educational institutions, and the new model school record will be transmitted to the Committee of Experts.

Moreover, the Government repeats the information previously communicated, that is, that no information contained in the student's school record has been used to discriminate with respect to access to training or in the continuation of studies. This is demonstrated by the massive enrolment of the population in educational programmes and the large number of high level degrees granted.

As concerns the cumulative labour record, a draft regulation on employment policy is now the object of consultations with trade unions, enterprises and central administration. This draft addresses recent developments and will replace the regulations in force, applied by resolution No. 51 of 1991.

The new draft defines the content of the cumulative labour record by indicating clearly that the new version may contain neither information on the political activities nor the merits or demerits which had previously been included in the old version of the file by virtue of resolution No. 590/1980. (The Government attached to its communication the text of article 82 of the draft regulation on employment policy which defines the content of the cumulative labour record.)

As concerns the personal verification form, which contains information on the worker's social conduct, it is necessary to emphasise that this form had been elaborated by the Andrés Gonzales Lines School of the Fishing Institute, where the establishment of a personal verification form was a part of the conditions required for the recruitment of qualified personnel. The verification of facts contained in the form is not a general practice and it is not in harmony with the principles which flow from the country's employment policy; it is effectuated as part of internal rules, which have since been modified by the Institute.

Moreover, it has been decided to conduct a general inquiry on the internal rules which have been established by some enterprises, with a view to pulling from files all information which may give a basis for erroneous evaluation of information given relative to moral attitudes or social conduct of workers and which are extraneous to that which is normally required to initiate an employment relationship in any system of employment relations.

The observation also mentioned examples presented by the ICFTU, based on the testimony of persons residing abroad who indicated that they had been involved, at times not stated in their declarations, in work disputes where they had complained about recognition of their rights. The state inspection conducted an inquiry on some of these cases. In a large number of mentioned cases, the ICFTU intended to present them in a false light, as if they concerned cases of discrimination for political reasons and only one case of discrimination on the basis of sex, when, in reality, the complaints were presented by workers who had enforced their rights sometimes by trade unions, sometimes by labour courts, and where they found, in each case, an adequate solution to their problems in conformity with the law. In a large number of cases, it was not possible to identify the person, the work centre, or the facts alleged, by reason of questionable witnesses who had been used abroad for propaganda.

2. As concerns the comments of the Latin American Central Organisation of Workers (CLAT), the Government has already sent a response, dated 3 February 1992, to the Office.

Access to training

As concerns paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Committee of Experts' observation, as indicated above, a new model school record is now being analysed with a view to removing from it all information foreign to the educational process. The Government reiterates the information previously given, that is that information contained in the records were not used for discriminatory purposes; nevertheless, the draft will amend the record.

Access to employment

As concerns paragraph 5 of the observation, the Government confirms that Legislative Decree No. 82 of 1984 and its implementing regulations do not contain political requirements relating to the employment system in the state bodies. This regulation is independent of the contents of the list of posts recognised by this system. The criteria set out by the Committee of Experts concerning management posts in the field of education are out of place as they are not based on the juridical concepts set out at the beginning of the paragraph. It has already been indicated that these provisions do not contain elements of a political nature, and that they do not relate to the list of posts. It must also be underscored that, contrary to what has been indicated by the Committee of Experts on the subject of the managerial posts and the "spirit of collectivism" and the "attachment to the masses and confidence in them", these requirements are not prohibited by Convention No. 111; these terms refer to characteristics of an educational system which offers to student organisations the possibility to participate in fundamental decisions concerning the system.

As concerns paragraphs 6 and 7 of the observation, the Government confirms that the provisions discussed there are undergoing an analysis which has as its object their adaptation to current circumstances and requirements which affect the activities which they regulate. The Government takes note of the observations of the Committee and will take them into consideration when elaborating the new standards in this field.

Evaluation of workers

As concerns the provisions enumerated in paragraph 8 of the observation the above information concerning modifications being made to the cumulative labour record apply.

Concerning resolution No. 590/1980, the Government indicates that it is about to finalise a process of consultation with the trade union organisations and the directions of the enterprises and bodies concerning a draft resolution which will repeal resolution No. 590 concerning labour merits and demerits. The draft amendment is also expected to remove the "list of work merits and demerits" previously kept in the file by virtue of the resolution, from the cumulative labour record. In so far as the consultations have concluded, the text of the amending resolution will be communicated to the Committee of Experts. (The Government attached to this communication the text of the draft resolution.)

The Government states the criteria previously mentioned and applied for evaluating the qualifications of workers with a view to their access to employment was not based on resolution No. 590 but on other provisions. These have been communicated to the Committee of Experts and have not been the subject of comments. Now, resolutions Nos. 18 and 19 of November 1990 and No. 4 of 1991, the texts of which were furnished to the Committee last year, are applicable.

Finally, the Government would like to emphasise that the Constitution as well as the Labour Code establish the principles of equality for all citizens and all workers in all matters relating to work and education. These are the principles which have guided the country's policies on employment and education. These principles are not a dead letter; to the contrary, they have concrete results in their practical application.

Cuba has the lowest unemployment rate in Latin America and, under the current economic conditions, has taken measures to ensure – without discrimination of any sort – that no worker will find himself without employment on account of job-creation policy. Adequate protection is also being guaranteed in each specific case.

As regards educational policy, a system which provides free education to the entire population – as demonstrated by the statistics on educational participation and the numbers of graduates from different centres of higher education – leaves no place for discrimination.

In addition, a Government representative reiterated the written information communicated by the Government. She added that the detailed information provided demonstrated the good will of her Government with respect to the employment policy in her country based on the principles of equality recognised in the Labour Code.

The Workers' members thanked the Government for the detailed information it communicated both orally and in writing. They noted that the case was very complicated and that it would be difficult for them to comment in detail on the various aspects. There appeared to be, however, some signs of progress. The Government had indicated in its document that the Ministry of Higher Education was reviewing the possibility of redefining the information to be contained in the school records. They requested the Government to provide full information on the results of this review to the Committee of Experts to enable it to examine the relevant information with respect to the application of the Convention. As concerns the cumulative labour records, it appeared that a draft regulation on employment policy was the object of consultations with trade unions, enterprises and the central administration. Further information on this point should also be provided to the Committee of Experts for examination. The personal verification forms which had apparently been elaborated by a fishing institute were not in accordance with the Government's wishes and the Government had indicated that a general inquiry on the internal rules established by some enterprises was being made so that all information which might give a [illegible] for erroneous evaluation would be pulled from the files. Finally, [illegible] noted the Government's indication that the revision of Resolution No. 590/1980 was the subject of consultation with the trade unions. While they certainly did not feel that the application of this Convention was yet assured, they welcomed the reviews being undertaken and hoped that all the relevant information would be communicated th the Committee of Experts in order to permit an examination of the situation. They hoped that the process undertaken by the Government and future dialogue would continue.

The Employers' members also noted tthe detailed information provided by the Government which, while last year appeared to be more quantitatiive than qualitative, this year indicated a favourable development. They recalled the Committee of Experts' comments concerning access to training, access to employment and the "moral" requirements taken into consideration in this regard. Unfortunately, the State was the judge of what was "moral" and this could include political criteria, in contradiction with this Convention. They welcomed the Government's indication that many of the comments made by the Committee of Experts were being reviewed and that changes would be made. They queried, however, whether the changes would be sufficient. They felt that the reply made by the Government was a step in the right direction and requested the Committee of Experts to examine the information supplied by the Government in detail in order to indicate whether next year the legal and practical situation in the country had indeed demonstrated better compliance with the Convention.

The Committee noted with interest the written and oral information provided by the Government. It appeared that progress was being made on the points raised by the Committee of Experts. It hoped that the Government would send further information on these points so that the Committee of Experts could make a full assessment on these points in the future.

Convention No. 118: Equality of Treatment (Social Security), 1962

Central African Republic (ratification 1964). A Government representative declared that in its report of April 1991 the Government referred to the draft text prepared by the Labour Department to bring national law and practice in question into conformity with the Convention; the constitutional procedure for the adoption of these text was already engaged and is in progress. In September 1991 the National Assembly adopted the law concerning the reform of state-owned companies, companies with both public and private ownership, and public organs of which the Central African Office of Social Security administrating the pensions of the wage earners covered by the Labour Code is one; this law requires those bodies to carry out reform of their organic rules. Moreover, the Ordinance No. 81/024 establishing the old-age, invalidity and survivors' pension scheme, as well as its implementing Decree No. 83/340 will be soon amended in order to respect the spirit of the Convention. The Government has also signed the Social Security Convention benefiting workers of Air Afrique. The non-application of the Convention is not an act of ill-will, but comes from the fact that there were problems of territorial application in respect of certain countries which had ratified the Convention where the law are applied only within the territory. In order not to impede the interests of the workers concerned, the Government is actually negotiating reciprocity agreements with, in particular, certain States in the region. Nevertheless, if all the countries which have ratified the Convention were respecting it, there would be no problem to the extent that this instrument itself contains a provision of reciprocity. The Government has always faced problems concerning the recognition of pension rights in relation to certain states, including signatories to the Convention, when the nationals of the Central African Republic who have worked there returned home. That's why the Government, knowing that the Convention contains an obligation of reciprocity, still seeks to conclude such agreements to deblock the situation. Finally, article 27 of the Law No. 65/66 expressly applies the provisions of the Convention: "Foreign workers vitims of an occupational accident or their dependants who cease to reside on the territory of the Central African Republic continue to receive their compensation benefits under the same conditions." This provision has been applied since 1965, particularly in case of occupational accidents, but the situation concerning pensions is more complex due to the difficulties encountered with certain member States which have ratified the Convention.

The Employers' members stated that the Government representative made essentially the same declarations as the previous year, except for two points. Firstly, the Government has provided to the ILO copies of the new social security laws but this Committee is not able to examine them, it will be for the Experts to decide whether they remedy the problem identified in their report. Secondly, and this is a new important point, the Government recognises now that the Convention, by its own terms, creates an obligation of reciprocity. However, part of the problem here consists in that this Committee does not know the countries signatories to the Convention with which the Central African Republic has difficulties. Once the Government has identified them, it would be in a position to receive technical assistance from the ILO to bring the whole system in line. The ILO might have to provide such assistance to other governments that seem to have difficulties in this area.

The Workers' members, recalling that this case has been discussed by the Committee of Experts over the past three years and was the subject of the debate in the present Committee, referred to the Committee of Experts which rightfully has pointed out to the Government that under the Convention equality of treatment in social security must be ensured automatically whatever the country of residence, even in the absence of bilateral or multilateral agreements. The Government seems to have accepted this interpretation now. The Government representative mentioned a draft text to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, but perhaps there is a danger in a sense that it is not a law which itself modifies the situation, but one which permits amending other texts. Therefore, the essential question is the following: when the Government will modify the law in question to bring its legislation in conformity with the requirements of the Convention? It would obviously be useful that the Government has recourse to the assistance of the Office for the drafting, but one should insist, in the first place, that real modifications be made in the legislation in the near future.

The Government representative specified that his Government has supplied copies of the laws on pensions, on occupational accidents, as well as the last text requiring the Central African Office of Social Security to amend its organic law. When this law is modified, the Government will include in it provisions to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government. It understood that the Government has provided recently the texts of Ordinance No. 81/024 and of Decree No. 83/340 to the ILO. The Committee was not in a position to discuss the substance of these regulations but also noted the Government's difficulties to change other regulations on the subject matter by reason of problems of reciprocity with other countries. It urged the Government to ask the ILO for technical assistance in that respect and hoped that the Government would be able to amend the legislation with a view fully to comply with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hopes that it will be able to conclude at one of its next sessions that such amendments had taken place.

Libyan Arab Jamahirya (ratification: 1975). A Government representative stated that the issues related to application of the Convention were still being submitted to the competent national authorities in view of the drafting of the necessary provisions and that he had asked these authorities to take into consideration the observations made by the Experts. He was of the opinion that his country needed technical assistance from the ILO to overcome the obstacles which made it difficult to send reports and to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention. He hoped that the National Commission set up to examine international labour Conventions and Recommendations would be received at the ILO headquarters in Geneva.

The Workers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had been asking for many years for the modifications of national legislation to satisfy the requirements of the Convention. This year the Committee of Experts again took up the different points which required action. Already in 1988, the report of the Committee of Experts mentioned that the Government had recommended to the National Commission set up to examine international labour Conventions and Recommendations to take into account the observations of the Experts, and this year the report provided exactly the same information. Nothing had changed. The Workers' members had consequently insisted that the Government take the necessary measures shortly to bring national legislation into full conformity with the Convention and emphasised that the latter was particularly important in the Libyan Arab Jamahirya given that the country had a large number of migrant workers who contributed to the national economy.

The Employers' members pointed out that although this Committee did not discuss frequently this Convention, it had been ratified by 37 countries. The Convention provided that any member State had to grant the same equality of treatment to the nationals of any other member State which had ratified the Convention that it granted to its own nationals in any branch of social security for which it had accepted the obligations of the Convention; it was thus important to note that the nationals of 36 countries had the right to equal treatment under Libyan legislation. The Employers' members had taken note of the request for technical assistance made by the Government representative. Given that the Government had difficulties in solving its legislative problems so that the requirements of the Convention could be met, they insisted that this Committee take note of this request in its conclusions and encourage the Government to take the necessary measures, with the assistance of the ILO, to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government. It felt bound to conclude that national legislation was still not in conformity with the Convention. In view of the difficulties to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention, it reminded the Government of the possibility of ILO technical assistance. It hoped that with this assistance the Government would be in a position to amend the legislation in the near future and to provide a full report to the ILO.

The Government representative expressed the hope that his Government would benefit from adequate assistance to ensure that there had been follow-up to the observations made by the Committee of Experts.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

Bolivia (ratification: 1977). A Government representative indicated, in response to the request by the Experts that it include in its next report more complete statistical data concerning in particular the volume and the distribution of labour, that a census had been carried out this year which would provide them with such data. He emphasised that, despite the difficult situation which his country was presently experiencing, his Government had made efforts to apply this Convention in the best possible manner. However, the principal concern was that they avoid the closure of enterprises and the laying off of workers as a result of structural adjustment policies recommended by international organisations. The observation of the Experts originated in 1985 when the first adjustment measures were taken involving the termination of 50,000 to 80,000 workers, including 30,000 miners. Today, the situation was entirely different and the frequency of terminations was greatly reduced as was made evident by the fact that the Office had not received any complaint in respect of this matter since 1986. In effect, his Government had sought to apply a policy that would not be automatically based upon the closure of enterprises or the termination of workers, but instead would be implemented by means of other kinds of solutions. The problem of employment creation was linked to the country's existing capacity for investment. In Bolivia this capacity had been minimal but jobs had all the same been created. Nevertheless, open unemployment had not been fully replaced by employment, although to a great extent had been reduced because of the existence of the informal sector. Hence, the unemployment rate which was 20 per cent in 1985 as stated in the Committee of Experts' report was presently between 6.5 and 7 per cent, according to the figures of the Latin American Economic Committee. One third of the economically active population were currently underemployed. Even if this did not involve full employment, it was still a bridge between open unemployment and employment. This situation had permitted his country to experience social peace that it would not have enjoyed if there had been an unemployment rate of 20 per cent. Finally, the speaker indicated that his Government would supply the Committee with the information requested as soon as the data obtained from the previously mentioned census was available.

The Workers' members emphasised that this Convention had not been conceived as a miracle cure for unemployment. The Government was not expected to introduce policies that would cure unemployment overnight. The Conference Committee had consistently examined the application by governments of this Convention and had attempted to ensure that in this respect countries of all parts of the world, both developed and less developed, were the subject of their attention to determine how their obligations under the Convention were being respected. They expressed satisfaction with the new census provision, because statistical information was essential for the establishment of valid employment policies. The 6.5 to 7 per cent "open unemployment rate" referred to by the Government member was compared to the 20 per cent and 19 per cent unemployment rates in 1989 and 1990 that were listed in the ILO Year Book of Labour Statistics. The term "open unemployment rate" was unfamiliar to them, and they noted that unemployment rates published by governments often differed from year to year because of changes in methods for compiling statistics. The Workers' members recognised the problems that Bolivia had faced since 1985, but the provisions of the Convention were not to be observed only in times of economic prosperity; the Convention was designed to address employment problems in all economic circumstances, and it was arguable that such provisions must be observed most closely during periods of recession and significant structural reforms. They emphasised that the main provision of the Convention was that countries should declare and pursue as a major goal an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. In order to establish such a policy, it was extremely important to consult with the social partners. The policy should not involve only those sectors of employment which the government controlled. The informal and rural sectors must also be taken into account. The Workers' members noted that the Committee of Experts' report asked the Government to indicate how the policy was being formulated, to specify the instrument in which it had been defined, and to describe the procedures adopted to ensure that the effects on employment of measures taken to promote economic development received due consideration. They requested in addition that information be provided on provisions the Government had adopted or was drawing up concerning consultation with the social partners. They concluded that although the extent of monetary investment was fundamental to a country's level of employment, investment must always be accompanied by the social dimension, which only the government itself could provide.

The Employers's members considered that the Government was doing what it could to solve its employment policy problems, and stressed that this was work that could not be carried out in isolation from other factors. They noted that the Government had instituted monetary stabilisation measures to reduce unemployment and that it was endeavouring to attract investment. Note was also taken that the real dimension of underemployment in the informal sector was very difficult to determine because of a lack of information about this area. It was hoped that the census might supply new data and updated facts and figures that could provide a basis for new measures. The creation of a vocational training institute, referred to in the Committee of Experts' report, was an extremely valuable investment for the future. When addressing the problem of unemployment, one must not only employ short-term solutions. Medium and long-term measures such as investment in vocational training also had important benefits.

The Employers' member of Bolivia explained that the termination of 30,000 miners in 1985 was not a result of a decision of the Government or of employers that had been freely made, but was a decision made at the metals market in London where the price of tin had fallen from $8 to $2.5 a pound. One must not forget that Bolivia was the third largest producer in the world of tin and that its expert represented more than 60 per cent of its income. He said that employment policies and problems must take into account events and conditions of international commerce.

The Government representative noted that in 1986 his country had experienced a very high number of terminations because of a decrease in prices and the closure of unprofitable enterprises, as a result of the application of recommendations of the International Monetary Fund. In response to the Workers' member, the speaker stated that when he had spoken about open unemployment, he simply meant unemployment, but that in reality even if this was not ideal a third of the economically active population was underemployed. It is these circumstances which permitted them to attain the 6.5 per cent or 7.0 per cent unemployment figures; even the ILO recognised the need to protect the informal sector, and had recommended that governments take measures in this area. Finally, he stated tht his Government was prepared to supply the information which the ILO might request in the future on this subject.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the interest that the Government had taken in the subject of the Convention. It hoped that the Government would supply the ILO with studies and statistical data, in order that full assessments could be made by the supervisory machinery.

Canada (ratification : 1966). A Government representative referred to the detailed report supplied by her Government to the Committee of Experts on the implementation of various programmes, measures and policies enacted by the Government of Canada to achieve the objective of reducing the deficit, controlling inflation and promoting economic growth and job creation. She reaffirmed the belief of her Government that the creation of an economic climate conducive to real and sustained growth was a precondition to the achievement of increased employment opportunities in the medium and long term. The objectives of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, enacted in 1985, were to improve the functioning of the labour market, to provide income protection for unemployed workers, to increase the occupational skills of Canada's human resources and to promote equality of access to employment.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy programme was divided into five major programmes:

(1) the Skill Investment Programme, designed to help workers adjust to changing technology and markets ;

(2) the Job Entry Programme, assisting specific groups, such as youth, who were having difficulty in entering or re-entering the labour market ;

(3) the Job Development Programme, designed to help the long-term unemployed to participate in the labour market and to enhance their employability through skills training and work experience by means, among other measures, of individually subsidised jobs ;

(4) the Skill Strategies Programme, providing support to employers for training individuals in designated cases of current or potential occupational skills shortages ;

(5) the Community Future Programme, assisting selected communities to assess their economic problems and develop employment opportunities through small business development, entrepreneurial support, training and relocation assistance.

The funds allocated to these programmes were in access of 1 billion dollars. In addition, her Government had established a Programme for Older Worker Adjustment, jointly funded and administered by the federal Government and the provinces, which provided income assistance to long service older workers who were victims of major permanent lay-offs and who had no prospects for re-employment. She noted that the problem of regional disparities mentioned by the Committee of Experts was likely to affect all ILO member States. The Canadian Jobs Strategy programme involved extensive consultations at the local level through the establishment of Local Advisory Councils. These Councils were composed of members from local businesses, trade unions and community groups which, together with government representatives, reviewed and assessed local employment issues. Furthermore, funding under this programme was allocated on a regional rather than on a by-programme basis so that different parts of the country were able to determine the best mix of training and employment promotion appropriate for their particular circumstances.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was established to foster the creation of a more favourable environment for sustained regional economic growth so as to reduce the diaparity between the four provinces in that part of the country and the rest of Canada. Similarly, the Western Economic Diversification Department was established in 1987 to expand the economic potential of the four Canadian western provinces. With respect to labour market and economic developments occurring since the Government's last report on this Convention, she reported that the prime lending interest rate had fallen to its lowest level in 19 years; the gross domestic product had increased 0.3 per cent in March, 0.2 per cent in January and 0.2 per cent in February; between April 1992 and May 1992, on a seasonally adjusted basis, employment increased by 31,000 overall; employment increased in manufacturing by 7,000; and the number of unemployed declined by 6,000 in the province of Quebec and by 1,000 in the province of Saskatchewan. The Unemployment Insurance Act had been amended so that the Government could move ahead with a comprehensive strategy designed to mobilise the efforts of all labour market partners in upgrading the skills of the workforce. Eight hundred million dollars were allocated to training and employment assistance measures representing a 50 per cent increase in federal expenditures for labour force upgrading. The Canadian Labour Force Department Board, created in January 1991, comprised of representatives from organised labour, the business community, social action groups and training institutions. Its mandate was to determine overall training priorities and address questions of standards for skill acquisition and upgrading. It would play a major role in preparing an annual expenditure plan for the extended developmental use of unemployment insurance funds. Under this new agency, up to 75 subregional labour market boards might be established. In addition, federal-provincial negotiations had been under way to enhance the employability of social assistance recipients. The new and expanded agreements included improved programmes, better linkages between Canada Employment Centres and welfare offices, long-terme interventions to help clients and the removal of disincentives for training. In conclusion, a concerted effort had been and continued to be made to foster a strong training culture with the joint cooperation and participation of both organised labour and business with the objective of setting national standards and improving the availability and accessibility of training programmes for those in need, with a special effort made to help social assistance recipients and disadvantaged groups improve their employment opportunities.

The Employers' members noted the information provided by the Government and stated that, while this subject area was a very complicated one, it seemed that the Government was moving in the right direction. They noted that according to the report of the Committee of Experts unemployment appeared to be at least 2 per cent lower than it was when this case was discussed in the Conference Committee in 1985. As concerns regional disparities in unemployment, they noted that this was not surprising in such a large country and felt that the Government's decision to allocate resources on a regional basis was a wise one. They agreed with the Government's approach not to permit unfocused spending to address unemployment but rather to invest in people. Spending must take into account the market – the market in this case being the skills necessary to meet the job requirements of employers. They noted in particular the efforts made to help those who were having difficulty getting into the job market. While it was clear that the Government had not yet found all the answers to its problems, they reaffirmed their belief that the Government was moving in the right direction and urged it to take all appropriate actions to lower the level of unemployment. The Workers' members thanked the Government for the detailed information provided. They recalled their previous interventions with respect to the section in the general part of the Committee of Experts' report dealing with this Convention. This Convention was very important regardless of the level of industrialisation of the country. They felt that all government policy should be elaborated with a view towards promoting freely chosen and productive employment. Employment policy should not be limited to the ministries of labour, employment and vocational training, but should be a concern of all ministries. They were dismayed that the Government had reaffirmed that its priority objectives were the reduction of the budget deficit and inflation control so as to promote economic growth and job creation. They noted that the Government was still pursuing its 1985 policy which they did not feel sufficiently addressed the relationship between employment policy objectives and other social and economic objectives. They recalled that, all too often, the objectives of other ministries were in opposition with the objective of the Convention. The increase of the abuse of flexible employment time, such as part-time, flexi-time, limited-term contracts, etc., endangered the right of the weakest workers in the labour market to freely chosen employment. They were therefore not fully convinced that the Government was pursuing the essential objectives of the Convention. This was made particularly evident by the increase in unemployment and the Government's priority objective of inflation control.

The Workers' member of Canada referred to the section of the general part of the Committee of Experts' report on the application of this Convention and stated that Canada was one of the OECD industrialised market economy countries surpassed those of 1988. Furthermore, there was great regional disparity in unemployment and a large group of long-term unemployed. In spite of these realities, the Government of Canada continued to pursue as its immediate aims, the reduction of inflation and the control of public spending, at the cost of the aim of full employment set out in the Convention. He noted that the Canadian unemployment figures set forth in the Committee of Experts' comments were out of date. More recent figures from January 1992 revealed a national unemployment rate of 10.4 per cent and provincial rates ranging from 7.1 per cent to 17.9 per cent. His country had been in a recession for over two years now. The forecast in the recent federal budget indicated that the national unemployment rate would remain at or near its present level through 1992 and well into 1993. Recent estimates from Statistics Canada's Labour Force Survey for May 1992 showed an increase in the national unemployment rate to 11.2 per cent or 1,536,000 persons. This represented the highest level of unemployment in Canada since 1984, and included provincial rates ranging from 7.7 to 20.1 per cent. All statistics quoted thus far were official government of Canada figures. When the Canadian Labour Congress calculated the "real unemployment rate" (including the underemployed, the "hidden unemployed" (persons who are not normally counted because they have given up the active search for a job), involuntary part-time workers and workers working short time or laid off part of the week), they stated that the number of persons unemployed or underemployed rose from 2,119,000 in October 1991 (15.2 per cent of the labour force) to 2,538,000 in January 1992 (17.0 per cent of the labour force). The recently tabled 1992 federal budget forecasts a national unemployment rate in excess of 10 per cent to the end of this year. This is nothing less than an admission of failure on the part of the Canadian Government – proof that current economic policies are not working. The real failure of the budget is that it does nothing to directly create jobs and increase confidence. The Government's basic thrust is to continue existing spending restraints such as cuts in transfer payments to the provinces and strict limits in the growth of virtually all areas of federal programme spending. In addition, the budget imposes new cuts of CDN$ 1 billion. Amongst these are a cut in federal training expenditures through the Canadian Jobs Strategy – which is mentioned in the Committee's Report – in the order of $100 million (rather than an increase to assist unemployed workers) and a continuing steady reduction of federal transfers to the provinces to fund post-secondary education and medicare. The central objective of the Canadian Labour Congress economic policy was to build a full employment economy – an economy capable of providing decent, well-paid, rewarding jobs for all who wanted and were able to work. Full employment was the indispensable basis of a strong income security system for working people and their families, the essential foundation stone of a fair society. A full employment economy would promote both equality of condition – decent living standards for all – and equality of opportunity, particularly for women, minorities, the disabled, indigenous people and others who face discrimination in the labour market. Full employment was the basis of a highly productive economy. Mass unemployment was nothing less than a waste of productive potential. Economic policies such as those currently implemented in his country, which created unemployment rather than actively promoting full, productive and freely chosen employment, were most certainly not in keeping with either the letter or the spirit of the Convention.

A Government member of Germany indicated his surprise to see the case of Canada on the list to speak before this Committee on this Convention. Referring to the questions raised in the Committee of Experts' comments for further information from the Government concerning the specific difficulties encountered in attaining the Convention's objectives and the possibility to evalutate the effect of its employment programmes, he wondered what criteria were used to call governments before this Committee on this Convention. He noted the Government's priority objective of reducing the budget deficit and combating inflation in order to promote economic growth and the creation of jobs and recalled that Article 1 of the Convention provided that: "With a view to stimulating economic growth and development, raising levels of living, meeting manpower requirements and overcoming unemployment and underemployment, each Member shall declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment." In his opinion, the Government's policy was not terribly far away from the Convention's objective.

The Employers' member of Canada indicated his surprise and disappointment that this case was brought to the attention of this Committee. He supported the new itnitiatives undertaken by his Government. The Government had allocated 1 billion dollars for job creation for new training programmes, retraining, upgrading, etc. The employment programmes in his country ranked among the best of all the industrialised countries of the world. Under the job strategy programme no one who was qualified would be denied unemployment insurance. The object of the programme was simply to replace unemployment with jobs. He believed that labour basically agreed with the programme but simply wanted government to pay for it rather than to use the resources of the unemployment insurance fund. Government, however, did not pay for anything; it was the taxpayers who paid. Certainly, labour would not want higher taxes for the already overtaxed Canadian citizens. He hoped that the new initiatives concerning job creation, training and upgrading would be given an opportunity to prove their effectiveness as a better alternative to throwing money at the problem and placing the burden on the taxpayers.

A Workers' member of Greece noted the importance of this Convention and recalled the serious consequences which could result from a government ignoring the need for an employment policy. He noted that there was a problem with the application of this Convention in Canada.

A Workers' member of Pakistan supported the concerns of Canadian workers, particularly concerning rising unemployment, regional disparity and equality. He hoped that the Government would take the necessary measures to reduce unemployment and to locate more resources to the provinces in order to obtain the objectives of the Convention.

The Government representative recalled that the Canadian Job Strategy Programme put an emphasis on assistance to the most disadvantaged members of the labour force, such as youth, women and other disadvantaged groups. As concerns her Government's priority objectives, she pointed out that the Convention provided that Government should pursue a policy to promote full and freely chosen employment but that it was up to the Government to design the policy which it felt would be most conducive to attaining that objective. She stressed that unemployment figures did not necessarily signify a violation of the Convention. No country operated in a vacuum and there were many factors which affected the unemployments rates of countries, independent of the government policy. Job creation implied the fostering of an economic climate which would be conducive to create jobs and could not occur without deficit reduction and inflation control.

A Workers' member of Italy insisted upon the importance of this Convention and suggested that a labour market policy was sufficient to resolve the relevant problem. It was not sufficient to simply transfer resources or make investments. The question was a very complicated one and it was necessary to undertake vocational training policies and to encourage the spirit of enterprise. Serious attention must be given to this problem in all countries both developed and developing.

The Committee welcomed the information given and the initiative taken by the Government. In view of the importance of the measures taken or envisaged, on the one hand, and the economic difficulties, including a high percentage of unemployment existing in the country, on the other hand, it expressed the hope that the Government would succeed in its endeavours to promote economic growth and job creation and that it would keep the ILO informed of all progress made in this regard.

Cuba (ratification: 1971). A Government representative stated that the employment policy in her country was based on the principles established in the Labour Code according to which work is provided taking into account the economic and social requirements, according to the choice of the worker, his talents and qualifications, which corresponds to Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Convention. In Cuba persons looking for employment have got two possibilities, either to request directly the organisms of labour which conclude contracts directly with the worker, or to go to a vocational orientation bureau of each municipality where they can be informed of available employment in the territory under the jurisdiction of the municipality. In this procedure, no element mentioned by the ICFTU enters in consideration and the labour relation is concluded in conformity with the provisions of Chapter II of the Labour Code concerning labour contracts. Last year, in spite of the difficult economic situation facing the country, the unemployment rate was less than 4 per cent. Cuba has about 3.5 million workers of which more than 30 per cent are specialists and technicians of intermediate or superior level. In view of these figures, not common in developing countries, she wonders how one can suspect discriminations in the country, if it was not by manipulation with political aims to speak ill of the social economic system of the country. The Government endeavours not to leave any worker without work, regardless of their political opinions, and offers various possibilities of new employment when it is necessary to introduce structural changes in the enterprises for such reasons as the decrease of fuels or lack of raw materials. The new employment should be useful and accessible to the worker according to his qualifications, in conformity with the regulation in force. The workers also have the possibility to take courses for qualification or re-employment. Those workers who did not find available employment receive 100 per cent of their former wages for the first month and 60 per cent for the following months. Here again, political opinion does not count and there is no pressure or coercion to engage oneself in an employment relationship. The speaker added that the provisions mentioned above stipulated that the worker could request and obtain re-employment in a profession or employment with different characteristics from what was shown in the provisions, which meant that the worker could freely look for employment of his choice.

The Workers' members noted the written information which the Government provided indicating in relation to Convention No. 111 that Cuba had the lowest unemployment rate in Latin America and has taken measures to ensure employment without discrimination. The difficult question here is whether there is freedom of choice: freedom not only to choose jobs, but also to have opportunities of training and general education to equip oneself for jobs, regardless of political convictions. So as to determine whether or not the Government is fulfilling obligations under Convention No. 122, the Government should send a report to the Committee of Experts indicating all the specific employment policy measures, as regards not only the legal obligations under the Convention but also the implementation of its spirit.

The Employers' members joined the opinion of the Workers' members and pointed out that the employment policies in Cuba seemed to involve forced labour under Conventions Nos. 29 and 105, which are also ratified by Cuba. The Government referred to Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Convention respecting account to be taken of the stage and level of economic development. The Employers' members wondered whether the economic situation in Cuba fit with what is contemplated in this provision of the Convention. They agreed with the Workers' members that the only way to clear up the situation was for the Government to report in detail the actual situation and to demonstrate that in fact workers can freely choose their work.

The Government representative emphasised that despite the economic difficulties, the Government had never abandoned its policy of full employment based on the equality of all workers without any discrimination. This can be supplemented by the reports on the application of Conventions Nos. 111 and 122 which are sufficiently explicit. As regards present regulations, they stipulate that the workers can be re-employed in useful and necessary jobs, but not in unproductive employment; a worker can also personally look for employment which is not necessarily employment that is offered within the framework of the Government's measures aimed to ensure the policy of full employment. Thus, the workers have absolute freedom to choose employment either offered by the authorities or looked for if they can find one; nothing prevents the new enterprise from recruiting workers if that enterprise considers that the worker has the necessary qualifications for the offered post. The speaker stated that the question of free choice was not a legal question but a practical and ongoing one, which is demonstrated in the extremely low unemployment rate of her country.

The Committee took due note of the information supplied by the Government. As it was not quite clear from that information whether the freedom of choice for workers as far as jobs are concerned was guaranteed, it asked the Government to send to the ILO a full report on the situation.

The Workers' member of Cuba stated that in Cuba workers had absolute freedom to choose their work. Trade unions would not accept any other system. The trade unions have been consulted by the Government and public authorities. The Central Organisation of Workers (CTC) started a debate on the means proposed so as to find a solution in the placement of workers in enterprises where there was not enough work available for such reasons as a lack of fuels, raw materials, etc. The law and practice in Cuba perfectly conformed with the idea that workers should have a real possibility to choose employment freely. When a worker wished to occupy one post which existed, he had all the possibilities to become the holder of that post. The speaker requested that his reservation on this conclusion be reflected.

Convention No. 127: Maximum Weight, 1967

Madagascar (ratification: 1971). A Government representative, the Minister of Labour, noted with regret that he could not supply any substantial information on the application of this Convention at this time. He assured the Committee, however, that upon his return to his country he would look into this question in detail in order to satisfy the comments raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members also expressed their regret that the Government was unable to reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts on this important matter. They recalled that the Committee of Experts had been making observations on this case since 1978. They noted that the last Government report was received in 1989. The national legislation only provided for fixing weight limits of loads transported by young workers and women. The Convention, however, provided that no worker shall be required or permitted to engage in manual transport of a load which by reason of its weight was likely to jeopardise his health or safety. There were, however, no limits on the weight of loads for adult men in Madagascar either in law or in practice. In Madagascar factories, traders, transporters and farmers used sacks of 90 kg, 75 kg or 70 kg which were manufactured locally. The use of sacks which were in conformity with international standards, in the opinion of the Government, gave rise to problems with respect to production cost and prices for manufacturers, users, producers and farmers. They noted from the Committee of Experts' report that in a letter from the Minister of Labour to the social partners, dated November 1988, the Government proposed that production units manufacture sacks of 55 kg or 65 kg by stages and launch them progressively on to the market "in order to avoid the harmful effects of the immediate application of the Convention in national law and so as not to be in opposition with the country's undertakings at the international level". Paragraph 14 of the Maximum Weight Recommendation fixed the maximum weight for loads which may be manually transported by an adult male worker at 55 kg. The Minister's recommendation was therefore not sufficient to ensure the application of the Convention. They requested the Government representative to indicate whether his Government intended to re-examine its position in this regard and to take the necessary measures to ensure conformity with the Convention for adult male workers. They also urged the Government to provide a detailed report in reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts in order to permit a complete evaluation of this situation.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Workers' members. They observed that this was the first occasion this case was discussed in this Committee. They regretted that the Government representative was not in a position to provide any substantial information and stressed the practical significance of this Convention. They urged the Government to make every effort to ensure compliance with its obligations in the future.

The Government representative noted the concerns expressed by the Committee on this very important question and assured that special efforts would be made to find an appropriate solution to these problems as soon as possible.

The Committee noted with regret the lack of substantial information from the Government. It recalled that observations had been made by the Committee of Experts on this case for many years. It felt bound to conclude that no progress had been made during all these years towards compliance with the requirements of the Convention, which had been ratified by the country more than 20 years ago. Therefore, the Committee strongly urged the Government to reconsider its position and amend the existing legislation as soon as possible and to inform the ILO accordingly.

Convention No. 129: Labour Inspection (Agriculture), 1969

Bolivia (ratification : 1977). The Government communicated the following information :

The Government underlines that the process of applying this Convention began in 1983 and 1984 when Supreme Decrees Nos. 19524 and 20255 were respectively adopted. These decrees brought sugar-cane and cotton harvest workers within the scope of the General Labour Act and its Regulatory Decree. Since 1992, ten extra civil servants have been incorporated into the inspection service in the country. This will help the inspection services for the mountainous rural zones in the valley and the tropical region which consists of the large rural spaces of the country. Furthermore, the national population and housing census to be carried out on 3 June 1992 will enable the Government and the public and private institutions to obtain, once the statistics have been analysed, quantatively accurate reports on the existence, placement and functioning of agricultural undertakings as defined in Article 1, paragraph 1, of this Convention, as well as on the distinction which separates agriculture from industry and commerce referred to in paragraph 2 of this Article. Moreover, the census will make it possible to determine, with more elements to judge, the human, social and economic components, among others, necessary to establish a well-structured system of labour inspection in the agricultural sector.

In addition, see the discussion under Convention No. 81.

Spain (ratification: 1973). The Government supplied the following information:

It is appropriate in the first place to point out that the observations of the Committee of Experts essentially originated in the comments supplied by the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Committees (CC.OO.) on 21 June 1989, in which it drew attention to problems resulting from the use of benzene in the leather and hide, chemical and shoe industries. These observations were transmitted to this administration by the general technical secretariat, in order to establish a report and to take the necessary measures. Such measures were as follows:

1. Information was requested from the general subadministration for chemical and pharmaceutical industries of the Ministry of Industry, Commerce and Tourism concerning the benzene industry in Spain; the latter sent an information memorandum on 20 November 1989 in which it indicated that benzene is produced from petroleum products in three enterprises: ERCROS, CEPSA and REPSOL PETOLEO. In 1988 production was 284,278 tons and consumption was approximately 300,000 tons. The memorandum also indicated that the principal consumers were petrochemical industries producing secondary products such as styrol, ciclohexane, dodecilbenzene, phenol, etc. At this time practically all of the benzene that is consumed is used for the manufacture of these products. On the other hand, enterprises using it as a solvent (primarily paint and varnish) have replaced them with other products (toluene and xylene). It is considered that benzene is no longer used for this purpose, which is consistent with data of the Labour and Social Security Inspectorate. The evolution of the market for principal chemical products, according to the annual report of the Spanish chemical industry, indicates that production and consumption of benzene have been maintained during the most recent yerars for which statistics are avasilable. In 1990 production was 280,025 tons and consumption was 297,030 tons.

2. In order to supervise the application of provisions contained in the relevant legislation (Convention No. 136 and the Resolution of 15 February 1957 of the General Labour Administration and of the General Administration for the Promotion of Industry and Technology), an order was drawn up (No. 105/89) by the General Labour Administration in order to develop specific action on the part of the Labour and Social Security Inspectorate at the national level, in enterprises or workplaces in which benzene or products which contain more than 1 per cent benzene are manufactured, used or handled. This specific action was carried out during the months of September and October 1989; enterprises were selected among those suspected of manufacturing, using or handling these chemical products, according to existing statistics, in provincial inspectorates, provincial technical offices for occupational safety and hygiene, and in provincial delegations from industry, conforming to the above-mentioned Resolution. This order was accompanied by a questionnaire of a kind used to carry out inspections, and a non-exhaustive list of the activities in which it was presumed that benzene was used. At the same time it was requested that data on inspections carried out during recent years concerning the activities that had been analysed, be sent to this general administration. As the criteria for selection was broad, it was not surprising that it extended to many enterprises having chemical, leather, hide and shoe activities, etc., which did not utilise benzene.

Among the most interested conclusions that can be drawn from the report, the following may be emphasised:

In respect of specific action, it is appropriate to point out that 1,561 work places were visited and that in only 20 was evidence found of the manufacture, use or handling of benzene. In some enterprises benzene was used in small quantities, in laboratories, in quality supervision or in cleaning operations. It is also appropriate to point out that, following this particular action, some enterprises decided to substitute other less dangerous chemical products for benzene.

The enterprises that produced benzene are large petroleum refineries. In these enterprises respect for standards is acceptable, even if there were some complaints.

In enterprises where it was considered that the legislation was not respected, note of the infractions was taken.

Other conclusions considered to be interesting that were contained in the report referred to are as follows:

In the first six months of 1989 another specific action was carried out at the national level in the tanned products sector. According to data available to the general administration, during the course of this inquiry, jobs involving the use of chemical substance together with the handling of animal products were analysed. For this purpose 244 work places, in which there were 895 jobs, were visited. In view of the fact that it had not been noted that benzene was used in these jobs, one may conclude that this product is uncommon in the tanning sector.

In reference to the use of benzene as a solvent for adhesives, glues or varnish used in the shoe manufacturing process, it is appropriate to note that this question was studied in the Province of Alicante by different organisations such as: the Labour Authority, the Labour Inspectorate, and the University (Faculty of Medicine). Presently, benzene is replaced by hexane, methyl, isobutylene, toluene, acetone, etc. In 1983 several jobs were found having above normal concentrations; subsequent to the analysis corresponding to glues and cements used in the industries of the Province, it was concluded that there was one case involving 3.6 per cent benzene, as an impurity of hexane, used as a solvent. In analyses carried out at other manufacturers of solvents, there only existed traces of benzene.

In following years analyses of organic vapours in jobs that involved work on glues were carried out: 312 in 1986, 400 in 1987, 248 in 1988, 693 until 31.07.1989. In these analyses the presence of benzene in concentrations above 1 per cent were not detected in glues and solvents.

During 1988 and 1989 specific operations were carried out in some provinces according to data supplied to this administration.

(a) at Albacete, 72 qualitative analyses of commercial products containing aromatic hydrocarbons or elfactives used as glues, solvents, adhesives, etc, in use in the leather, shoe, garment and other industries were carried out;

(b) at Cantabres, 400 qualitative analyses of products used in paints, varnishes, solvents, catalysers and others were carried out;

(c) at Toledo, the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Hygiene recently analysed products used in 82 workplaces in the wood-working sector and in 38 workplaces in the shoe sector.

With the exception of Cantabres, the presence of benzene in quantities not higher than the authorised standard was detected in five analysed products; in others no use of benzene was detected.

One must conclude that there is neither limitation nor failure to apply ILO Convention No. 136 on the protection of workers against the risks of benzene intoxication.

3. On the other hand, it is appropriate to point out that occupational illnesses caused by benzene and its derivatives are among those which occur least often among all stated occupational illnesses (according to statistics for occupational illnesses that were detected from 1988 to 1990 - 1990 Year Book of Labour Statistics, ATE 29; only one in 1988, toluene and xylene are included in the group comprised of benzene and its derivatives).

4. In addition, the use of benzene has been the subject of studies by other bodies within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which indicates that continued attention is being given to this problem. The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Hygiene programmed a specific project concerning benzene during 1990 (Project 524); the object of the project was to count the enterprises and processes using benzene, to determine levels of exposure and those persons exposed.

5. Finally, it may be noted that within the framework of planning the objectives of the Labour and Social Security Inspectorate for 1992 in the area of ocupational safety and hygiene, the following subsectors were selected for general action: manufacture of basic chemical products and chemical products for industry, among which are included workplaces manufacturing or making use of benzene for synthetic chemical products. Some provinces such as Baleares, Alicante and Cadiz selected shoe and hide activities as additional specific activities. Apart from this it is provided that in 1991 unplanned activities will be carried out (such as investigations of occupational injuries and diseases, complaints about unhealthy jobs, etc.). All of this allows one to say that during 1992 it is foreseen that the involvement of the Labour and Social Security Inspectorate in activities relating to the use of benzene shall continue.

In addition a Government representative referred to the written information supplied by his Government. He noted that the Committee of Experts had examined a series of comments on the application of the Convention presented by the Trade Union Confederation of Workers' Commissions (CC.OO) and stated that this organisation had been able to bring its complaint to the Labour Inspectorate because, in Spain, Conventions formed part of the national legislation and were directly applicable when they were suffficiently apt for concrete measures, as was the case here. This made possible both the corresponding administrative and judicial supervision without the need for any international forum. Finally, he pointed out that in the written information supplied by his Government contained a technical report on the points raised by the CC.OO, from which an assessment could be made of the action and measures taken by the Labour Inspectorate in the centres and sectors using benzene.

The Workers' members stated that it was not for the present Committee to examine the information which had been provided orally and in writing. However, since this was a technical Convention – and this Committee did not often have the opportunity to discuss such Conventions – which concerned the life and health of workers, note had to be taken of the information appearing in the comments of the CC.OO, mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report. According to these comments, 150,000 workers were involved, especially those working in black market undertakings, pregnant and nursing women. According to the information supplied by the Government in 1991 as well as that contained in the written information supplied by the Government this year, a specific action programme was underway with a view to applying the Convention. However, the Government had not replied to a series of earlier observations of the Committeee of Experts which concerned, amongst others, the measures taken or envisaged by the Labour Inspectorate concerning the use of benzene in the black market undertakings. Despite the fact that it was clear that the Government had taken some initiatives, the Workers' members were of the opinion that important questions remained unanswered, in particular that of the relative importance, over all the undertakings in question, of the figures provided by the Government in its written communications and that of the measures taken to ensure protection of workers in particular those working in black market enterprises, pregnant women and nursing mothers. They requested the Government to send a more complete report so that the Committee of Experts would be able to examine the application of the Convention in practice.

The Employers' members indicated that this issue concerned the follow-up of the debate on labour inspection, in a very technical field, that of finding out how widely benzene was used and what were the measures of control taken to protect workers and to reduce the dangers and risks. The Government representative had made mention of the various measures taken with the view to fulfilling the obligations arising under the Convention. These included the visits carried out by the Labour Inspectorate, studies undertaken to determine which workplaces still used benzene and on the type and number of cases of sickness which existed. In this respect, the Employers' members stressed that it was important to know whether the use of benzene was the real cause of the identified sicknesses. The also noted that the number of workers exposed to benzene had diminished, and they hoped that this tendency would continue. However, the main question was how many undertakings, including black market enterprises, still used benzene. They were of the opinion that this was a typical question of "grey figures" since it was difficult to obtain precise figures and to evaluate them correctly. They accordingly requested the Government to supply more complete written information on this problem, toghether with figures and statistics, so that the Committee of Experts would be able to evaluate in detail the technical points relating to the application of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Spain stated that he was in total agreement with the Workers' members. He indicated that the use and handling of benzene normally occurred in black market enterprises where labour inspection could not take place because the existence of such enterprises was not known. For these reasons it was necessary to adopt more general measures to be able to know the extent of the problems in order to resove them efficiently.

The Government representative welcomed all the interventions, and took particular note of the remarks made concerning the importance of the supervision of the use of benzene in black market enterprises.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. It understood that the Government would soon send to the ILO the written report which it had prepared on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts for it to fully assess the situation.

Convention No. 139: Occupational Cancer, 1974

Peru (ratification : 1976). A Government representative, Vice-Minister of Labour, referring to the prevention and control of occupational risks caused by carcinogenic substances or agents, noted the comments of the Committee of Experts regarding the elaboration and adoption as soon as possible of the study on the prevention and control of occupational cancer. In the absence of an organisation or arrangements with a governmental or private organisation that would carry out more effective control over the risks to which certain industrial workers were exposed, the Ministry of Labour, through its occupational health and safety inspetorate-general, had prepared as a temporary measure a project for the protection of workers exposed to dangerous substances. Furthermore, joint actions would be taken to deal with this problem in cooperation with the National Institute of Neoplastic Diseases, the National Institute of Occupational Health, and the Peruvian Institute of Social Security, the Pan-American Organisation of Health and non-governmental organisations. These measures would be included in the corresponding sectoral programmes. Due to the peculiar health situation prevailing in his country, the competent bodies had been engaged in fighting outbreaks like cholera. Currently they were trying to implement the study on the prevention and control of occupational cancer published by the ILO to which the Committee of Experts had made reference in its observations.

The Employers' members expressed their surprise that 16 years after its ratification the Government was setting up an inter-agency committee to draft laws to implement the Convention. They felt that this as well as the idea of conducting a study on the subject at this stage were steps backwards. At present, there was a need for drafting the necessary legislation using as a guide the ILO's study referred to by the Experts. Given the fact that this Convention is not a self-executing instrument, it was necessary to prepare and adopt legislation based on the above-mentioned ILO study which could be done with the technical assistance of the ILO.

The Worker' members shared the views expressed by the Employers' members. They considered this Convention to be an important one in today's world. They regretted to note that Peru has not taken steps to implement this Convention since its ratification in 1976. It was not sufficient for the Government to make inquiries of the two institutes on information concerning the application of the Convention. They recalled that the Committee of Experts has for several years been requesting the adoption of specific provisions to prevent and control occupational cancer. They urged the Government to take immediate action in this regard and encouraged it to seek the assistance of the Office for this purpose.

The Government representative stated in reply that, contrary to the understanding expressed by certain speakers, his Government was not about to conduct a study at this stage. He said it was proposing to implement a study which already exists. He believed that his Government will succeed in resolving these problems that have lasted many years with the assistance of this Committee, the Committee of Experts and the ILO. He also made reference to the possibility of his Government requesting technical or financial assistance from the ILO regarding the programmes that concern matters of this Convention.

The Committee noted with regret that no progress seems to have been made in the application of this Convention which has been examined by the Committee of Experts for several years. It considered that it was high time for taking immediate action and reminded the Government that the ILO's technical assistance was not limited to the legislative aspects of the question but includes matters relating to the implementation of the Convention. It urged the Government to bring the situation in Peru into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible.

Convention No. 141: Rural Workers' Organisations, 1975

Regarding the comments made by the Hind Mazdoor Sabha (HMS) relating to workers under the Employment Guarantee Scheme (EGS) in Maharashtra, the Government indicates that the EGS was started by the government of Maharashtra in 1972 to provide productive employment in rural areas and in "C" class municipal councils. The employment has to be gainful to the individuals and productive to the economy of the State. The guarantee to provide work has been restricted to unskilled manual work. The fundamental objective of the scheme is that, on completion of the works undertaken, some durable community assets should be generated and that the wages paid to the workers should be linked to the quantity of work done.

The norms for appointment of Muster Assistants were laid down by the Government in 1978. These norms, inter alia, provide for the appointment of Muster Assistants on a particular work when the average labour strength is between 50 and 150; and for the appointment of additional Muster Assistants for every subsequent increase in average labour strength by 150. The norms also require that local persons should be engaged as Muster Assistants and that their services should be dispensed with when the work is stopped or completed.

The intention of appointing Muster Assistants is mainly to maintain muster rolls on EGS workers and to provide drinking water facilities or medical facilities, etc., to the workmen on the work sites. Their job comes to an end as soon as the work under EGS is stopped. Thus, employment under EGS cannot be equated with normal employment as this is a one-sided affair where the state government has taken upon itself the task of providing employment to every adult in rural areas, whenever demanded by them. The very concept of works started under the EGS is altogether different from work started by an industrialist. In the latter case there is a need to employ persons whereas in works started under the EGS Scheme the need is for individuals and the state government to provide work for them under the obligation imposed by the Maharashtra Employment Guarantee Act. It is therefore basically wrong to hold that workmen employed under EGS are workmen as defined under section 2 (S) of the ID Act, 1947, or that work started under the said scheme are industries as defined under section 2 (J) of that Act.

Based on the above, the government of Maharashtra clarified, via its circulars dated 2 September and 10 September 1987, that the provisions of the ID Act 1947 and the Workmen's Compensation Act 1922, are not applicable to the workers and Muster Assistants employed under the EGS. Subsequently, these circulars were challenged by some of the Muster Assistants before the Aurangabad Bench of the Bombay High court in Writ Petition No. 1903/87. A Division Bench ruled that these circulars do not have the force of notification, as contemplated in the ID Act. However, the main issue as to whether the ID Act, 1947 and other labour laws are applicable to the Muster Assistants under EGS has not been examined by any of the benches of the Bombay High Court or by the supreme Court. Hence it is wrong to correlate striking down the circulars by the Bombay High Court with the question of the application of labour laws to the Muster Assistants under EGS. In fact, the Industrial Court at Nasik specifically held in its judgement delivered on 4 April 1989 that the ID Act 1947 and other labour laws are not applicable to Muster Assistants.

As regards the HMS's comment concerning the elimination of seniority lists of Muster Assistants by the Government, it is true that in 1985 the government of Mahrashtra had asked its district authorities to prepare a "Select List" for the appointment of Muster Assistants. However, on reconsideration, it was felt that the appointment of Muster Assistant is temporary as it is meant for maintaining attendance of EGS workers on a particular work. His appointment is terminated as soon as the work is stopped or completed. Moreover, under the norms issued by the Government in 1978, local persons are required to be appointed as Muster Assistants. Hence the Government cancelled its instructions to prepare a Select List for Muster Assistants in 1989.

In respect of the HMS's comment regarding non-implementation of court decisions in favour of dismissed workers, the complaint made by HMS is not based on facts. Whenever any Muster Assistant gets a stay order before his services are terminated, he continues to remain in service and to draw his regular pay of Rs 500 per month, even when there is no EGS work. However, in case the Labour Industrial Court gives a stay order against termination of a Muster Assistant after his services have already been terminated by the Government, the stay order of the Court becomes inoperative. In the case of Mr. Sheikh, quoted by HMS, it is not possible for the Government to give any specific comments in the absence of case details.

With reference to the HMS's comment concerning the conditions of employment of female workers employed on the "Integrated Development Scheme", it may be mentioned that the ICDS is a Centrally Sponsored Scheme. It visualises the running of village-level child care centres (Anganwadi) through local level women volunteers (Anganwadi workers) drawn from the community itself. Community participation is the bed-rock of the ICDS and the Anganwadi workers and helpers are volunteers from the community receiving a small honorarium and not any salary as such. They are to work for four hours a day in the Anganwadi and are expected to interact with the community in the villages as volunteers. Treating them as government employees negates the very basis of ICDS. Like any other scheme, the ICDS is also supervised by supervisors at the rate of one supervisor for 17 to 20 Anganwadis. Since these Anganwadi workers are supposed to be from the same village as that in which the centre is being run, there is no question of their being transferred from one place to another. From the above it is also clear that the Anganwadi workers and helpers, though mainly located in rural and tribal areas, do not fall under the category of rural workers as defined in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. It may, however, be mentioned that the right to freedom of association is guaranteed by the Constitution of India itself. Hence, anybody can form a union.

As regards the HMS's comments concerning the poor working conditions of workers in the forest and brick-making industries, the Government states that in the state of Maharashtra a large number of workers are engaged in brick making, forestry, construction and agriculture. Since these workers are mostly unorganised, the government of Maharashtra extended the Minimum Wages Act 1948 to them. The Act also, inter alia, regulates their service conditions like duty hours, overtime wages, weekly holidays, etc. These benefits are also enjoyed by the workers working on a daily wage basis continuously. However, the workers working on a daily wage basis cannot be made permanent as their being in employment depends upon the availability of work. Considering the problems faced by these unorganised workers, the Government subsequently brought them under the purview of the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act 1970 the Inter-State Migrant Labour Act 1979 and the Workmen's Compensation Act. For implementing these Acts, the Government has created extensive machinery. The proper implementation of these Acts, particularly the Minimum Wages Act, is of special concern to the Government. The enforcement has however not been very satisfactorily managed due to the lack of adequate labour inspection machinery to ensure that workplaces scattered over a wide area inspected regularly. The resource constraint has come in the way of reinforcement is in a strengthening of the existing enforcement machinery. The Government is in a continuous process of effecting improvements in this direction.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the complaint made by the Hind Mazdoor Sabha (HMS) concerning three points: the Employment Guarantee Scheme (EGS) in Maharashtra; women workers engaged in the Integrated Child Development Scheme (ICDS); and the case of forest workers and brick workers working on a daily rate basis in Maharashtra. The speaker then reiterated the written information provided by her Government.

The Workers' members welcomed the oral and written information provided by the Government to this Committee. They noted that this Convention was relatively new and that there had not been many occasions to discuss its application in this Committee. they noted the importance of the Convention and considered that the Committee of Experts should be able to comment upon the detailed information provided by the Government. They noted the Government's indication that the female workers in the ICDS would not fall under the category of rural workers defined in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. This was clearly a question upon which the Committee of Experts should pronounce itself. Finally, as concerns the poor working conditions in the forest and brick-making industries, they regretted the Government's statement that workers working on a daily basis could not be made permanent as their employment depended on the availability of work. This manner of hiring labour was clearly unsatisfactory. They concluded by reiterating that a legal assessment of the detailed information provided by the Government shoud be made by the Committee of Experts so that this Committee could come back to this case in the futures.

The Employers' members noted the Government's indication that it considered the workmen employed under the EGS, the female workers in the ICDS and the workers in the forest and brick-making industries were not wage earners as covered by the Convention. The Government had apparently made this determination, however, upon the basis of national legislation. It would be necessary for the Committee of Experts to determine what constitutes a wage earner under this Convention and this assessment should be made having recourse to the principles of the Vienna Convention on Treaties. The Committee of Experts' observation on this case this year was made without any information from the Government. The Committee of Experts, however, should be able to begin to fully assess this case given the information provided by the Government to this Committee. As concerns the EGS, it seemed that this was very similar to a public works job programme. It was not clear whether people working in such programmes would be covered by the Convention. There was the same lack of clarity concerning the application of the Convention to the voluntary workers in the ICDS who did, nevertheless, receive an honorarium and work four hours a day. Finally, as concerns the forest and brick-making workers it appeared quite likely that the Convention would apply. In any event, it was necessar to wait for the Commitee of Experts' assessment of the facts as they related to the provisions of the Convention. Once this was done the case could be considered again in this Committee.

The Government representative indicated that clearly her Government would benefit from an assessment by the Committee of Experts of the information which they had provided. She referred to the comment made by the Employers' members and confirmed that the EGS was like a public works programme. She reiterated that the workers in the ICDS were only volunteers.

The Committee took due note of the written and oral information supplied by the Government. It expected the Committee of Experts to be able to assess the situation on the basis of the data contained in the recent written communications made by the Government. The Committee hoped to be in a position to consider this case at one of its next session.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Territories

France (French Southern and Antarctic Territories). Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due on Conventions Nos. 8, 15, 22 and 23.

In addition, a Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts' comments contained in its report concerned the supply of reports on ratified Conventions and replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies. He pointed out that France had ratified 114 Conventions and that, by the next Conference, four of five more ratifications would no doubt be registered. Under article 35 of the Constitution, the Government tried to extend the obligations under ratified Conventions to the non-metropolitan territories and, indeed, these extensions were almost automatic for the Overseas Departments, which were one of the two types of French non-metropolitan territories. The Committee of Experts' request concerned these Overseas Departments. This year, as stated in the Experts' report, 48 reports were requested for metropolitan France and 199 for the non-metropolitant territories. This made a total of 247 reports due, to which had to be added the dozen or so comments requested by the supervisory bodies; the necessary replies in many cases amounted to real supplementary reports. The more ratifications undertaken by a country, the more supplementary reports had to be prepared; this increased the annual workload and made the two- and four-yearly reporting cycle, adopted in 1976, incomprehensible. The Government representative indicated that this was not intended as an excuse, but rather as the start of an explanation. The French administration services were not showing any bad faith in not replying to the reports, but perhaps simply a certain lassitude which became more evident in some years than in others. Many people thought that too many reports were requested from services which gave priority to national concerns rather than their international obligations. The ILO reports were among those due for other international organisations and often were perceived, rightly or wrongly, by the social administrations as a kind of routine, the usefulness of which was not always very clear. The Government representative regretted the shortcomings noted by the Committee of Experts and gave the assurance that he would follow up this point with the competent national services. Finally, he expressed the hope that, given the very large number of reports requested, this borderline case would further incite the Director of the Standards Department, as he had indicated in the general discussion, to re-examine the question of reports, their periodicity and their contents. This should be done without losing sight of the comments of the supervisory bodies which were closely linked to reporting, particularly from the point of view of a workload which was, at times, excessive. He was of the opinion that a certain discomfort existed and that this discomfort should certainly not provide an excuse for States which did not wish to ratify Conventions.

The Workers' members noted the explanations given by the Government representative to clarify the reasons for the failure to reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts. This was a case of no real will or adminsitrative fatigue brought about by the great number of Conventions on which reports were due. They noted the Government representative's request concerning the need to re-examine the reporting system and considered that the Office should reply to this. They stated that this case should be mentioned in the appropriate section of this Committee's report.

The Employers' members stated that the Government representative had indeed given explanations and not excuses for the problem facing a country which had ratified a large number of Conventions. He had expressly stated that the number of reports required sometimes gave rise to administrative fatigue and temporary difficulties. They expressed their fear that, in the future, more and more States would run into this problem. This tendency had already been visible the last few years as was shown by the increase in the non-respect of the obligation to supply reports and the reply to the comments of the supervisory bodies. This also occurred in countries which did not have as qualified an administration as France at their disposal. The Employers' members were of the view that the Government representative had rightly recalled the proposals made during the general discussion concerning the whole question of revising the reporting system. They expressed the hope that the countries which, despite having an excellent administration, faced difficulties, would make good proposals on this point. They hoped that, in this and other cases, the difficulties in fulfilling the constitutional obligations concerning supply of reports and replies would diminish and they asked that this case be noted in the appropriate part of this Committee's report in the future.

The representative of the Secretary-General replied to the question put by the Government representative, indicating that he clearly understood that the administrative obligations surrounding the preparation of reports were leading to an excessive workload for countries which had ratified a large number of Conventions, and that this had a negative effect – to use a metaphor – of the best students having to do more homework. He added that he was aware of the problem and that, with the help of the officials of the Standards Department, he would propose measures for the amendment of the reporting system with a view to simplifying it and to reducing reasonably the administrative work. This would not, however – and here lay the greatest difficulties – in any way affect the quality of the supervision carried out by this Committee and the Committee of Experts. The solution might be, to use the expression of the Government representative, a selective system. The representative of the Secretary-General thanked the speaker for raising the question again and stressed that the Secretariat had taken due note of his statements and of the fact that he would make proposals on this matter in the very near future.

The Government representative thanked the Workers' and Employers' members for their constructive remarks, and the Secretariat which had confirmed its wish to continue studying this problem.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government which mentioned the great number of Conventions ratified and referred to the considerable reporting burden which fell on the Government every year. The Committee also noted with interest the suggestion made by the Government to reconsider the reporting system. However, as long as the existing system was in force, it hoped that the Government would send in the reports and reply to the questions raised, as it had always done before. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its report.

Netherlands (Aruba). Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first reports due on Conventions Nos. 121, 140, 141 and 142.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

Bangladesh. The Government representative explained that during the 1980s the presidential form of government had existed in his country. Accordingly, it had been put to the Committee of Experts that submission to the President was sufficient to comply with the submisssion obligation. The Committee of Experts, however, found this unacceptable: it urged submission to Parliament and had made direct requests to the Government on this point. The matter was then taken up by the Ministry and in tripartite consultations. On 28 April 1992 the Ministry recommended, in agreement with the tripartite body, that submission be made to Parliament. In fact, this recommendation reflected recent constitutional amendments making government a parliamentary one. The relevant ILO instruments were placed before the Parliamentary Standing Committee on 11 May 1992; the Standing Committee joined in the opinion that they should be submitted to Parliament. The appropriate action was taken in accord with this opinion. The Government regretted the procedural delay and assured the Committee that updated submission would be made as early as possible.

The Employers' members observed that complete information had been given by the Government representative. The issue of which national authority was competent to receive submission had been raised previously in other cases; there was agreement that if a parliament lays down law,it should be able to examine ILO instruments to determine if laws needed to be made. The Employers hoped that the delay would be quickly cleared in light of the explanation given.

The Workers' members associated themselves wholly with the Employers' members.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government from which it understood the country was in the process of transition to a parliamentary democracy. It nevertheless underlined the necessity to fulfil the obligations the country had to report on the submission of ILO instruments to the competent national authorities. The Commitee decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Belize. A Government representative apologised for his Government's failure to submit to the competent authority the instruments adopted at the 70th to the 77th Sessions of the International Labour Conference. The Government had intended to submit these instruments prior to the commencing of this Conference but administrative problems had prevented them from so doing. He indicated that the preparatory work had been completed and assured that the instruments would be submitted in the very near future.

The Workers' members welcomed the Government's indication of its will to improve the situation concerning its submission obligation. They recalled that submission was the first step, indispensable to the implementation of international standards. They expressed the hope that the intentions expressed by the Government would become reality in the near future.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the comments made by the Workers' members.

The Workers' member of Belize expressed his disappointment and concern for the lack of action on the part of his Government with respect to its ILO obligations. He trusted that the necessary measures would be taken in the near future and assured that the workers' organisations of Belize would be monitoring the issue and would press the Government to ensure compliance with its obligations.

A Government member of Fiji welcomed the Government's honesty in admitting that it was at fault as opposed to trying to avoid or deny responsibility as was sometimes the case in this Committee.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government. It understood that the Government hoped to be in a position to fulfil its ILO obligations in the very near future. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Congo. See discussion under IA.

Kenya. In reply to the Committee of Experts' comments, the Government indicated that the delay in submitting several instruments to the national competent authorities is due to some unavoidable administrative and staffing difficulties, and to a general shortage of the staff.

Since the previous session of the International Labour Conference, the Government has been able to put through Parliament Sessional Paper No. 3 of 1991. This Paper covered the instruments adopted during the 64th Session (1978) - i.e. Conventions Nos. 150 and 151, and Recommendations Nos. 158 and 159.

In addition, it may be mentioned that all the necessary technical work has been completed in respect of Conventions Nos. 154 and 169. The necessary documentation to that effect will be soon furnished to the ILO.

Lebanon. See discussion under IA.

Pakistan. A Government representative stated that most of the Conventions mentioned in paragraph 145 had recently been sent to the competent authority, which in this case meant the Government, although there was not enough time to report in writing. He referred to interdepartmental consultations at lower state level, and to interministerial consultations at higher level before sending the subject to the Cabinet, and confirmed that before the next session of the International Labour Conference all this work would have been completed.

The Workers' members emphasised the importance of submission, which is a fundamental obligation under article 19 of the Constitution, and urged the Government to provide a written report to confirm the positive information provided today for the examination by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members agreed with the Workers' spokesman and hoped that the Government could, in the future, fulfil the obligation within the constitutional time-limits.

The Workers' member of Pakistan supported the Workers' and the Employers' spokesmen and hoped that the Government would discharge the obligation in time.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government from which it gathered that the relevant Conventions and Recommendations had been submitted in the meantime to the competent authorities in the country. It firmly hoped that the Government would fulfil its obligations fully in time in future and decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Panama. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided the information concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted from the 71st and 72nd Sessions of the Conference.

Papua New Guinea: See the discussion under Part IA.

Paraguay. A Government representative, the Vice Minister of Labour, thanked the Committee of Experts for its observations which helped his Government to correct the provisions which had resulted from the heavy burden of a dictatorial regime which had preferred isolation. He pointed out that his Government was beginning to change the situation, and this was evident just by its intention to become an active member of the ILO again and to refinance the debt owed to the Organisation over the last 35 years. Secondly, efforts were being made to change the obsolete legal structures in order to accommodate the democratic will of the people and the letter and spirit of international labour standards ratified by his country. Since the new Goverment was installed, presidential and legislative elections had been held and the electoral law had been modified to enable the participation of all adult citizens in the presentation of independent candidates. Municipal elections had been held resulting in the election of a former trade union leader. Furthermore, he noted that on 12 June 1992 the new national Constitution which was elaborated by all representative sectors of the national society would be concluded. Finally, he stated that one of the primary concerns for the Government had been the elaboration of the Labour Code which had been blocked in the National Parliament by a petition of these three unions requesting that the new national Constitution be promulgated first, since it introduced substantial reforms concerning all questions relating to labour activities.

As concerns the communication of reports in conformity with article 19 of the ILO Constitution, he admitted that his Government had encountered many administrative difficulties particularly during the last three years due to the institutional and legislative changes undertaken and changes in the staff responsible for this matter. He recognised, however, that this did not justify the lack of a report. The Ministry of Labour and his Government intended to resolve this situation rapidly and therefore had created a tripartite committee to review the issue of reports in order to comply with its obligations.

The Workers' members welcomed the indication made by the Government representative that his government would now become an active member of the ILO. They noted the information provided by the Government representative concerning the administrative difficulties faced in meeting its obligations with respect to article 19 of the Constitution. Recalling the frequent reference made by governments to administrative difficulties with respect to compliance with obligations, they stressed the importance of the duty to submit instruments to the competent authority and to provide reports on unratified Conventions to permit the general surveys to be as complete as possible. They urged the Goverment to do its utmost to remedy the situation and hoped that the situation would improve in the near future.

The Employers' members noted that it had been many years since the Committee had been able to hear from the Government and welcomed the changes which had taken place there. They recalled that the duty to submit Conventions and Recommendations adopted at the ILO Conference to the comptent authority was the first step towards the consideration of ratification. They added that reports on unratified Conventions were essential for the Committee of Experts to obtain a complete global picture of the situation around the world. They urged the Government to take the necessary measures to fulfil its obligations in these two areas.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative. It understood the difficulties the present Government had in bringing about considerable changes in the functioning of its machinery. It welcomed the assurances provided by the Government that it would report on time. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate sections of the report.

Portugal. In the first column of Appendix I of the report of the Committee of Experts (page 576 of the English text) replace the figures referred to by "31 to 77" and in the second column of the same line delete "77 (C.171; R.178)".

Sierra Leone. See the discussion under Part IA.

Zaire. A Government representative stated that his Government had endeavoured to respect its constitutional obligations and to communicate regularly for a few years the reports under Article 22. Since April 1990, his country had been in the process of democratisation of its political and social institutions. The period of transition entailed social tensions, political instability and work stoppages which paralysed labour administration. The national conference which was going on should result in changes. As regards the submission to the competent authorities, the instruments adopted in the 70th to 77th Sessions were in process and the information would be communicated continuously. The instruments adopted up to the 69th Session had not been submitted to the President of the Republic but the State undertakes, as a result of the work of the national conference, to submit these Conventions to the President of the Republic, as well as to the National Assembly, which are both authorities in charge of establishing laws in this field.

The Workers' members noted the reasons explained by the Government for the considerable delay and that the Government would make efforts to comunicate replies to the comments by the supervisory organs. They hoped that the Government would put the declared intentions and the undertakings into practice so as to catch up with the delay in submission.

The Employers' members, noting the difficulties encountered by the Government because of the present changes, expressed the hope that improvements would take place in future, that the reports would be supplied, the replies given to comments and the instruments submitted to the competent authorities, in particular to the National Assembly.

The Committee took note of the information given by the Government representative which referred to social unrest and political instability in the country. The Committee recalled how essential complying with the constitutional obligations was for the functions of the ILO supervisory machinery. It therefore expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to comply with these rules in the very near future and decided to mention this case in the apropriate section of its report.

International Labour Conference

Seventy-ninth Session, Geneva, 1992

Resolutions

Report of the Resolutions Committee

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 1992, was originally composed of 168 voting members (69 Government members, 45 Employers' members and 54 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The first business of the Committee was to elect its officers. On the proposal of Mr. Jorgensen (Government member, Denmark), seconded by Mr. Ausman (Government member Canada), Mr. Ejalu (Government member, Uganda) was unanimously elected Chairman. In accordance with the Committee's usual practice, the Chairman was appointed as Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairmen Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland).

3. The Committee had before it ten resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, these resolutions were all considered receivable. Referring to article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders, the Employers' Vice-Chairman raised the question of whether a person other than the author, or one of the authors, of a resolution was entitled to introduce it. The Representative of the Secretary-General read out an opinion of the Legal Adviser to the Conference according to which a substitute of the author of a resolution could introduce it on behalf of its author, on condition that he or she had been given written authorisation to that effect. He then confirmed that such written authorisation had been received for the presentation of the three resolutions submitted by Mr. Peirens (Workers' member, Belgium). While noting the opinion of the Legal Adviser, the Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his reservations concerning the procedure that was being followed and hoped that the matter would be considered in another appropriate forum.

4. The Government member of Mexico recalled the introductory remarks that he had made when submitting the Committee's report to the Plenary sitting of the 78th Session of the Conference concerning the improvement of the procedures and the work of the Committee. He had hoped, in particular, that the number of preambular paragraphs of the resolutions would be decreased and that they would be drawn up in sufficiently clear fashion. He noted that the establishment of a tripartite working group for the drafting of each resolution had been proposed in order to prevent the Committee itself becoming a drafting committee and so that it could concentrate on matters of substance. He invited the Office to facilitate an extensive revision of the procedures followed by the Committee and to make other proposals for their improvement.

5. The resolutions were then introduced by their authors or, in the case of three of them, by a substitute, in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a) of the Standing Orders, in the following order: (a) resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth; (b) resolution concerning the settlement of industrial disputes; (c) resolution concerning compensation for losses suffered by workers and employers because of the invasion of Kuwait; (d) resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families; (e) resolution concerning the contribution of enterprise development to the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment; (f) resolution concerning the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers; (g) resolution concerning the future role of the ILO with respect to the situation of migrant workers and their families and the causes of migratory flows; (h) resolution concerning the development of democracy, the internationalisation of the economy and the promotion of tripartism; (i) resolution concerning ILO action against social marginalisation, for the promotion of employment and equality of opportunity and treatment and for the development of human resources; and (j) resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of development.

6. After introducing the resolution concerning compensation for losses suffered by workers and employers because of the invasion of Kuwait, the Employers' member of Kuwait withdrew the resolution on behalf of its co-authors.

7. After these presentations, and before the vote held in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5 (a) of the Standing Orders, the following resolutions on related subjects were combined by their authors:

(a) a resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, submitted by Mr. Bingen de Arbeloa, Employers' delegate, Venezuela; Mr. Cevallos, Employers' delegate, Mexico; Mr Durling, Employers' delegate, Panama; Mr. Gazarin, Employers' delegate, Egypt; Ms. Hak, Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr Hultin, Employers' delegate, Finland; Ms. Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States; and Mr. Thüsing, Employers' delegate, Germany; and a resolution concerning the contribution of enterprise development to the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Ms. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada; Ms. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstrom, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen-Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Lettieri, Workers' delegate, Italy, Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the two texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment;

(b) a resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families, submitted by Mr. Abakirov, Workers' delegate, Kyrgystan; Mr. Goncharik, Workers' delegate, Belarus; Mr. Klotchkov, Workers' delegate, Russian Federation; and Mr. Veronese, Workers' delegate, France; a resolution concerning the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Norway; Ms. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada; Ms. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstrom, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen-Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Lettieri, Workers' delegate: Italy; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland; and a resolution concerning the future role of the ILO with respect to the situation of migrant workers and their families and the causes of migratory flows, submitted by Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium. The authors of these resolutions agree to combine the three texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families.

8. In accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5 (a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee determined the first five resolutions to be considered among the six remaining before the Committee and their order of priority. Owing to a change in the composition of the Committee, there were at this time 179 voting members (76 Government members with 658 votes each; 47 Employer members with 1,064 votes each; 56 Worker members with 893 votes each).[1]

9. The votes cast for the five resolutions were as follows:

1. Role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. 59,226 weighted votes
2. Employment promotion as an essential component of development. 544 weighted votes
3. Role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families. 329,018 weighted votes
4. Development of democracy, the internationalisation of the economy and the promotion of tripartism. 316,561 weighted votes
5. Settlement of industrial disputes. 293,287 weighted votes

10. Once the priority order for the consideration of the first five resolutions had been determined, only one further resolution remained before the Committee; there was therefore no requirement to set up a working party in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(b) of the Standing Orders.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ROLE OF ENTERPRISES IN EMPLOYMENT GROWTH AND THE CREATION OF FULL, PRODUCTIVE AND FREELY CHOSEN EMPLOYMENT

Presentation of the two original texts

11. In presenting the resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, the Employers' delegate of Australia recalled that the text of the draft resolution had been before the Committee on a number of previous occasions. The Committee had come close to adopting it at its session the previous year. While the Conference had already recognised the role of the market in the improvement of standards of living, when it adopted last year a resolution on structural adjustment, industrial relations and economic and social development, it had made little reference to the principal mechanism for the creation of employment and income, namely, the enterprise. It was time to fill that gap by recognising the fundamental role played by the enterprise in the market place. The text of the resolution emphasised the necessity of encouraging small and medium-sized enterprises in particular, as a fundamental condition for economic and social progress. Towards this end, it was important to improve the environment in which they operated and to encourage a spirit of entrepreneurship. The resolution indicated how the three partners could contribute to this process. In a period characterised by problems of structural adjustment, unemployment and, for many countries, the transition towards a market economy, it was important that the Conference give formal recognition to the role of entrepreneurship.

12. In presenting the resolution concerning the contribution of enterprise development to the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the expression "full, productive and freely chosen employment" was contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia as well as in the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and should be referred to in the present resolution. He recalled that unemployment and underemplyment remained the most serious problem in all countries, affecting millions of workers; it was necessary to end the cycle in which alternating periods of recession and growth ended by an increase in unemployment. This situation led to questions about the effects of technological change. It was necessary to ensure that this change exerted a positive influence on employment levels and working conditions. The present resolution recognised that the development of enterprises can and must contribute to employment growth. Its objective was to encourage the establishment of an environment in which they could flourish. The role played by small and medium-sized enterprises was also well recognised. The resolution listed the indispensable conditions for enterprises to create employment, namely, government policies which provided the necessary infrastructure, economic and employment policies adopted in consultation with employers' and workers' organisations and respect for trade union rights. As far as the ILO was concerned, the resolution emphasised the activities that should be undertaken in order to favour the development of national policies to stimulate the creation of lasting employment by enterprises. The resolution contained similarities to other texts before the Committee, and the Workers' group was ready to examine the possibility of merging the texts.

General discussion

13. The Employers' member of Germany, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, referred to the cooperative attitude of the Workers' group which had made it possible to merge the two original texts and thanked the Committee for having given the merged resolution its first priority. The Employers' group did not intend to make any amendments to the text. He hoped that the Workers' group and the Government members would also refrain from doing so, and that the resolution would be adopted unanimously.

14. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed the support of his group for the merged text, which was the result of intensive discussion. He observed that the Employers' group had been very constructive in these discussions. The Workers' group did not intend to propose any amendments. He hoped that the other groups would follow their example and that the resolution would be adopted unanimously in its current form.

15. The Government member of the United Kingdom re-emphasised her support for the original Employers' resolution but welcomed the merging of the two complementary texts into a single resolution which her Government could also support without reservations. It was important that the Employers' group, as well as the Workers' group, and the Governments, should succeed from time to time in obtaining first position for a resolution that they had supported. She re-emphasised the crucial role of enterprise in job creation and economic growth. In order for enterprises to flourish, governments needed to establish an environment which would encourage entrepreneurs, and in particular those setting up small businesses, both in industrialised and developing countries. The ILO was already doing extremely useful work in helping countries to develop policies which would contribute to the promotion of enterprises. Her Government had welcomed the establishment of the new ILO department dealing with small and medium-sized enterprises and looked for a strengthening of these activities in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1994-95. The proposed resolution would help to stimulate that effort and should therefore be adopted forthwith.

16. The Government member of the United States congratulated the Employers' and Workers' groups for the spirit of cooperation that they had shown in merging the two initial resolutions. Her Government supported the resolution and recognised the importance of the role played by small enterprises in economic growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. In her country, small businesses provided well over two-thirds of all new jobs, about 40 per cent of gross national product, and the bulk of new products and technologies. She pointed out that the present text should be seen as the ILO's response to United Nations General Assembly resolution 46/188 on entrepreneurship, which had been adopted in 1990 and which requested, inter alia, the Director-General for Development and International Economic Cooperation to include in his reports information on the activities undertaken in the United Nations system to promote entrepreneurship in economic development, notably in small and medium-sized enterprises. She indicated that her Government reserved the right to propose amendments later.

17. The Government members of the Syrian Arab Republic, the Russian Federation and Denmark spoke in support of the resolution, and stated that they would not present amendments to it. The Government member of the United States then indicated that her Government would also abstain from the presentation of amendments and would have no objection to the immediate adoption of the resolution.

18. The resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment was adopted unanimously without amendment.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION AS AN ESSENTIAL COMPONENT OF DEVELOPMENT

Presentation of the original text

19. The Workers' member of the Russian Federation introduced the resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of development on behalf of all the trade unions of the Russian Federation and of the other countries that had co-authored it. Unemployment was a universal problem, affecting both market economies and countries whose economies were in transition. For the latter, it was the first time unemployment had reached such a scale, and it was now one of the most urgent tasks for trade unions to tackle. It was necessary to provide help for the unemployed through training so that they could be reintegrated in the labour market. The authors of the resolution had no objection to merging the resolution and were ready to work with other delegates to that effect.

General discussion

20. The Worker Vice-Chairman declared that the Workers' group was strongly in favour of this resolution on employment and development and hoped that it would be adopted as rapidly as possible.

21. The Workers' member of the Russian Federation was glad to note that the draft resolution had been supported by so many governments and employers. As problems of employment were now causing concern in many countries, the particular aspects of employment dealt with in the draft resolution could be seen as a logical follow-up to the resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. The draft resolution developed the general ideas of that resolution, adding the importance of ILO action at national and regional level. The Workers' group believed that the resolution should remain short and succinct and hoped it would be supported by the Committee.

22. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that, although the draft resolution covered many of the same elements as the Employers' and Workers' original resolutions on enterprise, its focus was different, stressing as it did the links between development and employment promotion and addressing in particular developing countries and countries in central and eastern Europe whose economies were in transition. As it formed a useful complement to the more general merged text on enterprise which had already been adopted, her Government supported its adoption. The draft resolution attempted to tackle some very difficult issues concerned with unemployment and underemployment, the need to help disadvantaged groups in the labour market, and relations between countries in terms of trade, economic cooperation, migration for employment, and other issues. It pinpointed some key challenges which the ILO itself had to face, including the particularly important one of effective cooperation with other organisations of the United Nations. Her Government supported the draft resolution overall but would present some amendments, with the aim of clarifying the text and focusing it on the most important issues, and on those most central to the ILO's mandate. Her delegation was heartened to see in the first two positions of the ballot resolutions dealing directly with such important issues as enterprise and employment, issues which were at the heart of the ILO's mandate and objective and which did not digress into broad geo-political debates which were more properly tackled in other international arenas. It was right that the Resolutions Committee should be discussing employment and it showed that the ILO was gettting to grips with real priorities as the 21st century approached.

23. The Government member of the United States informed the Committee that her Government supported parts of the draft resolution. For instance, improving access to, and the quality of, employment service and vocational training programmes, moving young people more effectively from school to work and reintegrating the unemployed as quickly as possible were extremely important in making full use of the workforce and were crucial to building or maintaining a nation's economic strength in a competitive world market place. Her Department of Labor had initiated a series of school-to-work demonstration projects designed to explore ways of redesigning school curricula so that students would learn job-related subjects in a practical context. In addition, new efforts were being made to ensure that students who were not destined for further study were better prepared to enter the workforce. The Secretary of Labor's Commission on Achieving Necessary Skills (SCANS) had been established to bring businesses, labour and education together to define the skills and skill levels necessary for earning a decent living, and its first report had provide practical and concrete suggestions to help schools, businesses and labour groups, parents and students to improve the preparation of young people for work. More emphasis should be given in the draft resolution to the importance of the private sector in the process of job creation, and her Government would therefore submit and support amendments which, among other things, made a distinction between the responsibilities of government and the role of the private sector.

24. The Government member of the Netherlands informed the Committee that his Government found the draft resolution generally acceptable, but would be presenting amendments, particularly on the paragraph concerning the "brain drain".

25. The Employers' member of Germany, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, noted that his group had not given such high priority to this resolution, as most of the subject matter had been dealt with in the resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. For his group the draft resolution was overly inspired by the concept of central planning and did not acknowledge that the market place and the spirit of free enterprise were the true driving force in the creation of employment. As the role of governments was to create an environment in which enterprises could prosper, the draft resolution should reflect this reality. If the resolutions adopted by the ILO were to remain credible, the mention of "trade" in the text should be clarified. Trade was outside the ILO's province, and commercial links were not made at government level, but by the respective parties concerned. The idea as formulated in the draft resolution did not convey this. Reviving the World Employment Programme was a controversial proposal. As early as 1976 the Employers' group had stated that the programme was not relevant, and it was even less relevant now. The conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in 1987, were more suitable for dealing with employment problems. The Employers' group would therefore be formulating amendments that would make the resolution more acceptable.

26. The Government member of the Russian Federation declared the draft resolution to be very important, as it addressed various aspects of employment. It was only natural that the problem of employment was now attracting a great deal of attention in the ILO, given the economic changes in the world, structural adjustment and the transition of a number of countries to a market economy. His delegation gave its support to the resolution.

27. The Government member of Italy supported many of the general principles and concepts of the resolution. He recognised the vital importance of creating jobs, given the difficult situation of unemployment that existed in so many countries. However, these principles were perhaps too general and he would have liked more specific proposals. Paragraph 1(d), for example, on training for young people and retraining for the unemployed, could be more fully elaborated. Italy is especially sensitive to these questions and has supported training programmes through bilateral and multi-bilateral funding. Referring to paragraph 1(g), the subject of migrant workers was already covered by the third resolution. Nor had any effective remedy been found to the old question of the "brain drain". His Government would find it difficult to support the present wording of this part of the resolution because it would imply hampering the freedom of movement of individuals.

28. The Employers' member of Sweden also emphasised that it would be better to avoid one possible interpretation of the question of the "brain drain" – that people should be prevented from leaving their home country. Freedom of movement was a human right, and it would be unacceptable to curb this right. This difficulty would not arise if the statement was formulated so as to make it clear that it was a recommendation to receiving countries to take into account in their immigration policies the need of sending countries to keep their qualified people.

29. The Workers' Vice-Chairman announced that the Workers' group would be proposing a single amendment to the text – to delete subparagraph (g) in operative paragraph 1, which contained a reference to migration and the "brain drain".

30. The Employers' member of the United States drew the attention of the Committee to the need for consistency in the resolution with the provisions of the first resolution that had just been adopted unanimously, on the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. As an example, she cited paragraph 1(a) of the resolution on employment promotion, which appeared to be in conflict with the resolution on the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. It was essential to achieve consistency between the resolution already adopted and the present draft resolution by emphasising that economic growth and the stimulation of small and medium-sized enterprises promoted employment, and not the reverse.

31. The Government member of Ukraine noted with satisfaction that the resolution under discussion had been given some priority. Its subject was a current topic for Ukraine and for other countries in transition which shared concern over the decline of opportunities for employment, problems relating to the restructuring of the economy, the introduction of new technologies, and industrial conversion. He drew the Committee's attention to those operative paragraphs whose aim was to encourage member States, with assistance from the ILO and other bodies, to increase significantly the number and quality of jobs by taking the necessary political, economic and social measures at national and international level. Another important recommendation urged member States to intensify efforts to devise national and regional vocational training programmes, thereby ensuring greater scope and a higher level of effectiveness. His delegation fully supported the draft resolution.

Consideration of amendments

32. Twenty-four amendments, numbered from D.5 to D.28, were submitted for examination.

Amendment to the title

33. Amendment D.14, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to insert the word "economic" after the words "component of " in the title of the resolution.

34. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out the need to give greater focus to the resolution and therefore to identify the type of development that was intended.

35. The Workers' Vice-Chairman responded that employment promotion was an essential component of all facets of development, including economic, social and cultural development, tripartism and the development of institutions, infrastructures and social systems. He therefore rejected the proposed amendment, which restricted the scope of the resolution.

36. The Government member of Nigeria agreed that the proposed amendment restricted the scope of the title and said that development should be seen as a broad concept.

37. The Government member of Denmark added that the term "development" was standard United Nations language and that the use of the word in the resolution represented a well-understood concept.

38. The Government member of the United Kingdom, although content with the present title of the resolution, proposed to sub-amend amendment D.14 by inserting the word "overall" instead of the word "economic" after the words "component of ".

39. Amendment D.14, as sub-amended by the Government member of the United Kingdom, was adopted.

Amendments to the Preamble

40. Paragraph 1 of the Preamble was adopted without amendment.

41. Amendment D.15, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace, in paragraph 2, the words, "according to the Declaration of Philadelphia, to promote programmes which will achieve full employment," by the words "to promote programmes oriented towards full, productive and freely chosen employment".

42. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that much had happened since the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944. Although his group did not wish to call into question a Declaration that was fundamental to the Organisation, it would nevertheless be beneficial to express this part of the paragraph in more up-to-date language, such as that contained in more recent ILO instruments on employment policy.

43. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed the surprise of his group at an amendment which seemed to call into question one of the fundamental documents of the ILO. The proposed amendment sought to paraphrase that document and therefore risked weakening it. He also emphasised that the paragraph as it stood reflected the need, outlined by various Government members in the general discussion and in Governing Body deliberations, to concentrate on activities that were within the core mandate of the ILO. The Commitment to full employment that was contained in the Declaration of Philadelphia was also reflected in Convention No. 122; he would therefore have no objection to including a reference to that Convention in the paragraph.

44. After a discussion in which a number of government members referred to the need to maintain the brevity of the text and acknowledged the value of referring to instruments on employment that had been adopted more recently than the Declaration of Philadelphia, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.15 by adding at the end of the paragraph the words "and reaffirming continuous support for the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).".

45. Amendment D.15, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

46. Paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the Preamble were adopted without amendment.

47. Amendment D.16, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to add in the last line of paragraph 6, after the words "and countries in transition," the words "and noting that the pressing and ongoing need to reverse this situation can be met by measures such as the encouragement of an entrepreneurial approach, and the promotion of small- and medium-scale enterprises and self-employment,".

48. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the paragraph in its present form identified a number of problems but gave no indication as to how they should be solved. The proposed wording reflected the thrust of the resolution that the Commitee had just adopted. However, each resolution stood on its own and it was therefore necessary to refer in the present text to the means of overcoming the problems of unemployment and underemployment.

49. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the preambular part of the text was not the correct place to propose solutions. Moreover, the proposed amendment only referred to one element of the problem. In order to obtain a balanced text, if this reference was included, it would also be necessary to mention a whole series of other aspects, such as industrial policy and infractructure, which would have the effect of making the language unmanageable.

50. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, after communicating his disappointment at the rejection of a balanced approach to employment growth, withdrew amendment D.16 in order to help the Committee advance its work.

51. Amendment D.17.bis, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the words after "respect for" in paragraph 7 with the words "and fully apply the principles relating to freedom of association and free and voluntary collective bargaining embodied in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98,".

52. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, although fully aware of the reasons for the reference to the freedoms and rights to organise and collective bargaining, wondered whether it was necessary to refer to Conventions Nos. 135 and 141, which were not the basic ILO texts setting out these principles. He noted that not all countries had ratified the Conventions in question and might have some difficulty in undertaking to apply their principles. In any case, the references to the texts should be in proper form.

53. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the four Conventions in question embodied the fundamental principles of freedom of association and fell within the scope of the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association. He proposed to sub-amend the paragraph by replacing the words after "respect for" with the words "the principles contained in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) and the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141),".

54. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic reminded the Committee of the need for the text to be concise and to the point. He wondered if it was necessary to refer to all four instruments in the context of freedom of association and suggested that a more general reference might be made to the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining embodied in international instruments, and especially in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

55. In reply to the previous speaker and to comments by the Government member of Denmark concerning the length and language of the resolution, and its internal organisation, the Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the references in preambular paagraph 2 to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and in paragraph 7 to the four instruments in question concerning freedom of association were completely logical.

56. The Employers' Vice-Chairman added that each group many problems which needed to be reflected in the text of resolutions which were adopted and, although the language was sometimes inelegant, there was always a good reason for the way in which it was drafted.

57. Amendment D.17.bis, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

58. Amendment D.18.bis, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the words following "of governments" in paragraph 8 by the words "to promote an environment which stimulates the development and growth of the market place and the importance of consultation with employers' and workers' organisations in the formulation of relevant policies;".

59. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman outlined the difficulties of his group in accepting the way in which the present text referred to the responsibilities of governments. The references to development plans were too close to "dirigisme" and too far away from the market economy. The proposed amendment also had the advantage of referring to consultations in their appropriate context.

60. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that his group's understanding of development did not exclude the market place, although that term evoked a number of concepts and situations, some of which were not suitable in this context.

61. The Government member of Romania felt that the text should reflect the need for employers' and workers' organisations to be associated with governments in the promotion of an environment which would stimulate overall development, and emphasised that the sound functioning of tripartism was the best safeguard in achieving that goal.

62. After a number of speakers, including the Workers' Vice-Chairman, had discussed the possibility of further sub-amendments, the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed the following compromise text of the paragraph:

Recognising the responsibility of governments in the field of development policy and in the promotion of an environment which stimulates growth and employment and the importance of consultation with employers' and workers' organisations in the formulation of relevant policies in these areas;"

63. Amendment D.18.bis, as sub-amended by the Government member of the United Kingdom, was adopted.

64. The Preamble was adopted as amended.

Amendments to the Operative part

65. Amendment D.19, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace paragraph 1 by the following text: "Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:".

66. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed to the need to call upon employers' and workers' organisations to take action in addition to governments. He added that the wording had been taken from a text proposed by the Workers' group themselves.

67. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.19 by replacing the word "Invites" by the word "Urges".

68. Amendment D.19, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

69. Amendment D.20, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the text after "freely chosen employment" in paragraph 1(a) by the words "and to raise the standard of living of the population by stimulating sustained economic growth and development;".

70. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that it merely consisted of a redrafting of the text in order to make the paragraph easier to understand. This was required so that the logic would be clear, and to show that it was necessary to stimulate sustained economic growth and development in order to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment.

71. In reply, the Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that the proposed amendment blurred the logic of the original text. Full employment was instrumental in stimulating economic growth and development, which had the effect of raising the standard of living of the population.

72. The Government member of Nigeria proposed to sub-amend amendment D.20 by replacing the text after "freely chosen employment" by the words "through sustained economic growth and development, and thereby raise the standard of living of the population;".

73. Amendment D.10, as sub-amended by the Government member of Nigeria, was adopted.

74. Amendment D.21, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to delete from paragraph 1(b) the words "to adopt a policy of incentives for job-creative economic activities, this policy being based on national development criteria and in line with national policies;".

75. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed concern about the reference in the original text to job-creative economic activities. This terminology led his group to interpret the action that was being called for as the provision of incentives for the creation of jobs which were not necessarily productive. However, after receiving assurance that amendment D.12 which addressed the same issue, would not be withdrawn, he withdrew amendment D.21.

76. Amendment D.12, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace, in paragraph 1(b), the words "to adopt a policy of incentives for job-creative economic activities, this policy being based on national development criteria and in line with national policies", by the words "to adopt policies which encourage job-creative economic activities, in line with national policies and where appropriate being based on national development criteria".

77. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands explained that the purpose of the proposed amendment was to place the emphasis on policies for creating jobs rather than on incentives.

78. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was prepared to accept amendment D.12 if a sub-amendment could be incorporated to delete the words "where appropriate being based on nationals", so that the first half of the paragraph would read "to adopt policies which encourage job-creative economic activities, in line with national policies and development criteria;".

79. Amendment D.12, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

80. Amendment D.7, submitted by the Government members of Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 1(d) by the following text: "to develop programmes that would assist in helping to prepare young people, the long-term unemployed and workers who have interrupted their working life for productive employment;".

81. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Switzerland explained that the reference to social protection was not suited to programmes that were intended to prepare people for employment. The text would be more flexible and more acceptable to a greater number of countries if social protection was not referred to in this context.

82. The Workers' Vice-Chairman found a number of difficulties with the proposed amendment. In the first place, it left out all reference to the social protection of young workers. Moreover, it did not explain the concept of reintegration in a clear manner. He added that the whole question of interruptions in working life was complex, and that the assumption of family responsibilities was one of the major cases in which this occurred. He noted that the reference to restructuring or reconversion contained in the original text was particularly relevant at the present time. Although he was not opposed to expressing the sentiments of the original text in a simpler manner, the proposed amendment took too many short cuts. He identified three elements which needed to be covered in any proposed text. These were: the question of the insertion of young workers; the issue of the integration of workers who had interrupted their employment for a variety of reasons, including studies, family responsibilities, health and even because they had been sent to prison; and finally, those whose employment had been interrupted as a result of restructuring or reconversion. It was for these reasons that reference was needed to both employment and social protection programmes.

83. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his support for amendment D.7. However, in a spirit of compromise and in order to take into account the concerns of the previous speakers, he proposed to sub-amend the text to read as follows: "to develop programmes, including training and retraining programmes, that would assist in helping to prepare young people, the long-term unemployed and workers who have interrupted their working life for various reasons, to assume skilled and productive employment and to return to work".

84. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed a further sub-amendment which would result in the text reading as follows: "to develop social and employment programmes that would help to prepare the entry of young people into working life and the reintegration in the labour market of the long-term unemployed and workers who have interrupted their working life for various reasons, such as family responsibilities, and to provide retraining for workers displaced by restructuring or reconversion in certain sectors of the economy".

85. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed certain reservations concerning the wording and length of the text proposed by the above speaker and suggested that it be modified to read as follows: "to develop social, employment and training programmes that would help to prepare the entry of young people into working life and the reintegration in the labour market of the long-term unemployed, workers displaced by restructuring or reconversion and workers who have interrupted their working life for various reasons, such as family responsibilities".

86. The Government member of the United States expressed a preference for the latter proposal, although she felt that governments should encourage rather than develop programmes. She also believed that the reference to social programmes should be eliminated from the text. She requested the Workers' Vice-Chairman to explain what types of social programmes the reference might cover.

87. The Workers' Vice-Chairman disagreed with the sentiments expressed by the previous speaker and explained that the social programmes in question included all types of social programmes designed to help young people before they had really become inserted into working life. Such an enumeration in the text would be lengthy and it was therefore preferable to retain the general reference to social programmes.

88. The Government member of the United States wished to note that her delegation still retained reservations on the wording of the proposed text. However, in a spirit of compromise she did not wish to prevent the Committee from adopting it.

89. Amendment D.7, as sub-amended, was adopted.

90. Amendment D.22 was withdrawn by its authors.

91. Amendment D.6, which was submitted by the Government member of Nigeria and seconded by the Government of Algeria, proposed to add, after paragraph 1(d), the following new paragraph: "to take appropriate measures in ensuring that employment conditions in all categories of establishments meet acceptable international standards;".

92. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Nigeria explained that one of the principal growth areas for employment promotion, as covered in the resolution, was in small businesses, and particularly in the informal sector. However, the employment conditions in the informal sector and in small businesses were generally substandard. It was therefore important for workers in these sectors to have access to employment which met acceptable international standards, by which he explained he meant international labour standards, and therefore the word "labour" should be added.

93. The Employers' Vice-Chairman sought clarification on the concept of acceptable international labour standards. Did these mean ILO standards or other norms, such as standards that have come to exist through custom and practice? He warned of a possible conflict between international standards and perfectly acceptable standards developed at the national level. Countries in which more advanced standards were in force should not oblige small developing countries to apply conditions which could seriously inhibit the success of small businesses. Moreover, he noted that many countries had notified the ILO that they would not be able to apply some of the provisions of international labour standards for some time to come.

94. The Workers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the amendment, although he proposed to sub-amend it to read as follows: "to take measures to ensure that employment conditions in all categories of establishments meet international labour standards;".

95. The Employers' Vice-Chairman referred to the problems involved in calling for all member States to apply the provisions of all ILO Conventions. Ways of avoiding this problem had been found in the past and he accordingly proposed to sub-amend the text suggested by the previous speaker so that it would read as follows: "to take appropriate measures to ensure that employment conditions in all categories of establishments respect the principles of ILO standards;".

96. The Government member of Nigeria noted that the above wording did not differ fundamentally from the text proposed previously by the Workers' group and therefore accepted it.

97. Although noting some fine points of difference between the proposed texts, the Workers' Vice-Chairman also found it acceptable.

98. Amendment D.6, as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

99. Amendment D.23, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to delete the words "as well as the regional level" from paragraph 1(e).

100. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that this group was merely attempting to clarify the text, since it was unclear how the phrase in question related to the rest of the paragraph.

101. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that the phrase in question attempted to convey the message that cooperation between countries was not only bilateral, but could also be undertaken at the regional level. However, his group could accept the amendment.

102. Amendment D.23 was adopted.

103. Amendment D.11, submitted by Government members of the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the Unites States, sought to delete paragraph 1(f).

104. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States explained that the reference in the text to "equitable and mutually advantageous terms of trade" entered areas which lay within the competence of other United Nations bodies. However, the co-sponsors of the amendment were prepared to withdraw it in favour of amendment D.24.

105. Amendment D.11 was withdrawn.

106. Amendment D.24, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace the words ", based on equitable and mutually advantageous terms of trade" in paragraph 1(f), by the words "as a means of increasing economic activity and thus to increase employment opportunities, improve living standards and eliminate hunger and poverty".

107. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the concern of his group was for the resolution to be consistent with the aims of the ILO. The reference to "terms of trade" in the original text was therefore not particularly appropriate.

108. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that this group could accept the amendment, provided that the word "equitable" was included in the first line of the text after the word "promote". In response to a question from the Employers' group, he explained that the term "equitable" was intended to convey the concept of trade that was fair for all concerned and mutually beneficial and advantageous.

109. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the amendment as originally proposed by the Employers' group. While it was clear that the concept of world trade was supported by all delegations, it was not acceptable for the text of an ILO resolution to comment on the type of world trade that was to be promoted.

110. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a further sub-amendment which would have the effect of replacing the word "equitable" by the words "on a fair basis". The text of the paragraph would therefore read: "to promote long-term development of world trade on a fair basis, as a means of increasing economic activity and thus to increase employment opportunities, improve living standards and eliminate hunger and poverty;".

111. Amendment D.24, as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

112. Amendment D.5, submitted by the Workers' group, and amendment D.10, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, both sought to delete paragraph 1(g).

113. Amendment D.5, which was identical to amendment D.10, was adopted.

114. Amendment D.8, submitted by the Government members of Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to add, after paragraph 1(g), the following new paragraph: "to develop a stable macroeconomic environment, market-determined prices and private entrepreneurship."

115. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States emphasised that employment growth was not possible without a stable macroeconomic environment. The value of money needed to be relatively stable in order to encourage savers and investors to look to the long term. Market-based prices had the effect of directing resources towards the most efficient economic sectors. Moreover, entrepreneurship was particularly important in the context of employment promotion, since new businesses were the most effective source of new jobs.

116. The Workers' Vice-Chairman informed the Committee that his group experienced serious problems in understanding how the amendment fitted into the present text. Nothing specific in the preambular paragraphs was pertinent to the proposed new paragraph. The issues referred to in the amendment had been covered thoroughly and well in the previous resolution adopted by the Committee. He strongly believed that the proposed wording was out of place in the present text, although there was complementarity between this resolution and the one which had been adopted earlier.

117. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed to add at the end of the new paragraph a reference that made it clear that the measures set out in the text were a means of resolving unemployment problems and developing overall growth.

118. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with the suggestion by the previous speaker and noted that preambular paragraph 8, as amended by the Committee, directly foreshadowed the proposed new paragraph.

119. The Government member of Greece, although not objecting to the amendment, warned of the risk of contradiction in the text of the resolution. Paragraph 1(a) of the resolution had, at least initially, called for an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, so as to stimulate sustained economic growth and development. However, the proposed text called for economic development as a means of resolving unemployment. It was for governments to decide on their priorities in economic policy, which could include combating inflation, promoting growth, decreasing unemployment or resolving the budget deficit. If amendment D.8 were adopted, it would be unclear which of these aims were to be given overall priority.

120. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed to the difficulty of defining a stable macroeconomic environment, particularly for countries undergoing the transition to a market economy. The concept could be interpreted in ways that were unacceptable to his group. The topic was so broad that it would need a whole resolution to itself. Moreover, the concept of market-determined price was unclear and was not directly related to the contents of the resolution. Prices determined only by the market could fluctuate very rapidly, with negative effects on employment and the well-being of people. This was a different question from a sensible price policy, and it would have to be expressed differently if included in the text. Referring to the question of entrepreneurship, he noted that this had been covered in a careful manner in the previous resolution and should not be included in the present text.

121. The Employers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that in order to achieve employment growth and overall development, it was important to take into account all relevant aspects, and not just select ones.

122. The Government member of Denmark pointed to a number of problems in the proposed text, including the fact that many industrialised countries did not apply a policy that was based entirely on market-determined prices. It might be better to refer in the text to prices oriented to market conditions.

123. The Government member of the Netherlands proposed to sub-amend the text to read as follows: "to develop a market-oriented macroeconomic environment with private entrepreneurship as a means of resolving unemployment problems and developing overall growth."

124. The Workers' Vice-Chairman found the above proposal to be helpful, but further proposed to delete the words "with private entrepreneurship" so that the paragraph would read: "to develop a market-oriented macroeconomic environment as a means of solving problems of unemployment and developing overall growth."

125. The Employer member of Germany, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, although very much regretting that the reference to private entrepreneurship had been dropped, confirmed that the Employers' group could agree to the above wording.

126. Amendment D.8, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

127. The Committee agreed to examine together amendments D.25 and D.9, which both referred to paragraph 2(a).

128. Amendment D.25, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace paragraph 2(a) by the following text: "encourage member States to take the necessary policy measures that would lead to increased economic activities in order to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment and to provide advice to member States in this respect;"

129. Introducing the amendment, the spokesman of the Employers' group, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, explained that the order of the ideas expressed in the original paragraph needed correcting. It was necessary to increase economic activity before employment would grow.

130. Amendment D.9, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace the words "to increase employment substantially", by the words "to establish a framework within which employment can increase substantially", and to replace the words "the necessary" by the word "appropriate".

131. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom noted that its purpose was to take account of the fact that it was not always within the power of governments to increase employment, but that it was their role to create an environment in which employment could grow. In some cases, government intervention might not be the best way of addressing the issue, and therefore the word "appropriate" would cover a broader range of situations than "the necessary".

132. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed a preference for amendment D.9, which he proposed to sub-amend so that the beginning of paragraph 2(a) would read: "encourage member States to establish a framework for substantial employment growth". He accepted the replacement of "the necessary" by the word "appropriate".

133. The spokesman of the Employers' group, agreed to withdraw amendment D.25 in favour of amendment D.9, as sub-amended by the previous speaker.

134. Amendment D.9, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

135. Amendments D.26, D.28 and D.13 addressed paragraph 2(b).

136. Amendment D.26, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace paragraph 2(b) by the following text: "take particular account of the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 when planning future activities in support of employment growth;".

137. Introducing the amendment, the spokesman of the Employers' group explained that in the view of his group the World Employment Programme had already been inappropriate in 1976 and had not improved over time. However, the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting were more appropriate to the current situation and should be reflected at this stage in the resolution.

138. Amendment D.28, submitted by the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, sought to replace paragraph 2(b) by the following text: "prepare an assessment of developments since the World Employment Conference of 1976, with particular reference to the planned second High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment, keeping in mind the transition to a market economy and the introduction of new technologies, and submit it to the Governing Body;".

139. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Finland recalled that much had changed since the World Employment Conference in 1976 and it would therefore be more appropriate to assess development since then and allow the Governing Body latitude to decide how to proceed further. It was also appropriate to make reference to a second High-Level Meeting, which had already been proposed.

140. Amendment D.13, submitted by the Government members of Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace, in the first line of paragraph 2(b), the word "update" by the word "review", and also to replace the words "to submit a draft update" by the words "to consider submitting a draft update".

141. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom agreed with previous speakers that it was not desirable to update something which was now no longer relevant. A review should be carried out so that action appropriate to the present circumstances could be taken.

142. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, in seeking a compromise text, noted that there were three important elements that should be included, namely: the need to make an assessment of developments since the World Employment Conference; the necessity to take into account the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment; and the question of what should be submitted to the Governing Body. He therefore suggested that members of the Committee might support a text that read as follows: "to assess the developments since the adoption of the World Employment Programme, taking especially into account the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 and submit relevant proposals for action to the Governing Body at an early date;".

143. The spokesman of the Employers' group expressed his agreement in principle with the proposed text. However, mention had already been made in the programme and budget for 1992-93 for a second High-Level Meeting. Reference should therefore be made to that meeting in the text of the resolution. However, he could accept the proposed text provided that it was understood that it covered the second High-Level Meeting.

144. The text proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, on the basis of amendments D.26, D.28 and D.13, was adopted.

145. Amendement D.27, submitted by the Employers' group, proposed to add to the end of paragraph 2(d), the words, "taking fully into account the process of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy".

146. Introducing the amendment, the spokesman of the Employers' group, said that it was important not only to describe the objectives to be attained, but also to refer to the methods that should be followed in achieving them. It was therefore important for the processes of structural adjustment and the transition to a market economy to be taken into account. He added that the phrase had been taken from the original resolution co-authored by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

147. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that reference had been made to structural adjustment earlier in the text and could not see the need for adding such a mention to the present paragraph. Moreover, the proposed addition changed the content of the whole paragraph.

148. The Government members of Denmark, the Netherlands and Finland agreed that the process of structural adjustment had already been taken fully into account throughout the resolution. Including the reference at this point ran the risk of being interpreted as a limitation on the areas in which the ILO should cooperate with other organisations of the United Nations system.

149. At the next sitting of the Committee the Employers' Vice-Chairman withdrew amendment D.27 noting that it had received insufficient support in the Committee.

Adoption of the resolution

150. The resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of overall development was adopted by consensus as amended.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE ROLE OF THE ILO IN THE PROTECTION AND PROMOTION OF THE RIGHTS OF MIGRANT WORKERS AND THEIR FAMILIES

Presentation of the three original texts

151. In presenting the resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families, the Worker member of France noted that the text before the Committee proposed a constructive approach for the harmonious integration of migrant workers into the economic and social life of the receiving countries. These objectives would contribute to new growth, involving as major elements both the elimination of any discrimination on the grounds of race, language or opinion (irrespective of whether they were philosophical or religious) and the respect of the economic, social and cultural rights and dignity of migrant workers. Several aspects of the proposed text were related to another draft resolution concerning the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers, which would be presented in due course. The text responded to three requirements: the need to combat social marginalisation, inequality, and the sources of racism, the development of human resources and the economic potential of each country; the achievement of a new relationship between sending and receiving countries with a view to achieving an effective distribution of the wealth that was produced.

152. Presenting the resolution concerning the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers, the Worker member of the United States said that the text was in effect a call for action for social justice and basic human rights, which were frequently denied to migrant workers which, as a group, are among the most exploited workers in the world and least able to defend their own rights. The text was more concise than the one proposed the previous year and took up the terms of the resolution adopted by the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference of the ILO, held in Bangkok. In paragraph 1(d) of its operative part, it invited governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to apply strictly laws and regulations to combat all forms of racism and xenophobia. Another important provision, paragraph 2(b), called for the Committee on Discrimination to examine on a regular basis the conditions of migrant workers. The draft text contained other fundamental provisions which merited careful examination by the Committee with a view to putting them into practice.

153. Presenting the resolution concerning the future role of the ILO with respect to the situation of migrant workers and their families and the causes of migratory flows, the personal substitute of the Workers' delegate of Belgium explained that the text had been inspired by three factors: the worrying situation of developing countries and Eastern European countries; the rise of the extreme right, of racism and of ethnic conflicts; and the unequal treatment to which migrant workers were subjected in receiving countries. The ILO had an essential role to play in this context. However, there were gaps in international labour standards due to the fact that some standards were not sufficiently well applied, that others encountered persistent problems in their implementation, such as Convention No. 111, or because certain Conventions relating to migrant workers had not been widely ratified. The objective of this resolution was to make a constructive contribution to the problems encountered by migrant workers.

General discussion

154. The Workers' member of the United States expressed his satisfaction at being able to submit to the Committee a concise and eminently practical draft resolution, as a result of the concerted efforts to merge the three initial texts. The resolution was not limited to any particular category of workers or geographical area, since the problems arising in the protection of migrant workers were of a universal nature and of crucial importance for workers, as well as for employers and governments. The text set out a thoughtful and meaningful plan of action for the ILO. It had the support of the whole of the Workers' group and deserved to be supported by the other members of the Committee.

155. The Government member of Turkey congratulated the authors of the three original draft texts on their success in submitting a merged resolution. The references to racism and xenophobia appearing in the resolution were relevant to him. However, these terms were relatively imprecise and more specific reference should therefore be made to the racial discrimination, harassment and violence of which migrant workers were the victims.

156. The Workers' member of Chile considered that, in view of the far-reaching economic changes in the world, and in particular in Latin America, the ILO should strengthen its activities in relation to migrant workers and that the proposed resolution contributed to that objective. He referred to several countries in his region in which migrant workers experienced many problems and were the victims of a manifest lack of social justice. The Committee should give its support to the resolution, which would be a positive instrument for millions of workers throughout the world.

157. The Government member of Italy emphasised that the issue of migration for employment was becoming increasingly complex. His country had signed and ratified the majority of the instruments referred to in the preamble of the draft resolution. The basic rights of equality of treatment, freedom of association and good working conditions should apply to all migrant workers who were legally resident in the receiving country. But serious difficulties arose with workers who could not be considered to be migrant workers in the sense envisaged in the resolution, because they were not legally resident in the host country. Illegal immigration caused serious problems as much for workers as for receiving countries in respect of employment, unemployment and housing. Although his Government supported the text in principle, he expressed reservations regarding the wording of several paragraphs in the preamble and operative part of the text. In particular, references to the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and the role of the ILO as mentioned in paragraph II of the preamble posed problems. In the operative part paragraphs 2(a) (which would raise financial problems that would be difficult to reconcile with the Organisation's zero-growth budget), 2(b) (in which the reference to the Committee against Discrimination should be eliminated), 2(c) which should be eliminated, 2(e) (as well as 1(f)) (which should mention not only the rights but also the duties of migrant workers), 2(h) and 2(i) should be modified. Appropriate amendments would be submitted.

158. The Government member of the United Kingdom recognised that the question of migration for employment was a very important issue and that it legitimately fell within the mandate of the ILO. The Organisation had done valuable work in this area in its promotion of equality of treatment and in helping in the repatriation of migrant workers under special circumstances, such as the Gulf War. However, the current text of the resolution raised considerable problems. Some of the language was inappropriate, particularly when all member States were called upon to apply too many instruments, some of which were not ILO instruments. The financial implications of some of the proposed activities would also need careful examination. Although she expressed support for the thrust of the resolution, she indicated that its text would require considerable changes before it could be adopted.

159. The Workers' member of Tunisia recalled the profound changes which were occurring in the world, the consequences of which affected migrant workers, and particularly those in developing countries. The resolution had been submitted at an appropriate time and sought to protect and promote the rights of migrant workers and their families. It applied to all ILO member States and should therefore be adopted.

160. The Employers' Vice-Chairman recognised that the situation of migrant workers undoubtedly posed problems. However, a number of initiatives had already been taken in this connection, both by the ILO and by other United Nations bodies. The resolution as proposed raised some hesitation in his mind. The relevance of the multiplicity of references to legal instruments contained in the preambular paragraphs needed to be reviewed, especially in the case of instruments not adopted by the ILO. Moreover, the meaning of a number of the paragraphs needed clarification. By calling for increased resources for ILO activities in respect of migrant workers, the resolution also raised problems concerning the identification of priorities, in the light of the tight financial situation of the Organisation. The setting of a higher priority for migrant workers was not necessarily justified. He also questioned the need for the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination to examine the conditions of migrant workers on a regular basis and for the convening of a tripartite advisory meeting, when two meetings had already been held on that subject.

161. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic noted that the ILO was the United Nations agency which was at the forefront in defending the rights of migrant workers. He pointed out that in Arab countries the national legislation reflected the principle of the equality of all human beings and said that migrant workers were treated in the same way as all other workers.

162. The Workers' member of the Russian Federation observed that the problem of migrant workers had increased in urgency due to the developments in Eastern Europe. The simplification of visa systems had enabled large groups to move across national frontiers in search of jobs. Often these workers encountered problems because of their lack of familiarity with foreign languages and laws and as a result of competition on the labour market from local workers. The number of people migrating for employment was constantly increasing, and it was time that the ILO addressed this issue before it was too late. The adoption of the resolution would stengthen the position of migrant workers on the basis of social justice and freedom of association.

163. The Workers' member of Iraq drew attention to the fact that many migrant workers and their families suffered from a low standard of living and were among the most underprivileged categories of the population in receiving countries. He expressed his support for the proposed resolution, with the exception of paragraph 2(h) of the operative part, which should be reformulated in more general terms in order to protect the rights of migrant workers during periods of armed conflict without referring to a specific situation.

164. The Government member of the Netherlands recognised the importance of the resolution, the thrust of which was acceptable, subject to some minor amendments which he would submit.

165. The Workers' member of Sri Lanka called upon ILO member States to ratify Conventions Nos. 97, 118, 143 and 157 in order to protect the rights of migrant workers and their families. He emphasised the need for equal treatment between nationals and migrant workers in respect of remuneration, working and living conditions, particularly in the case of women, who were often the victims of the gravest inequalities of treatment.

166. The Government member of Saudi Arabia stated that his Government respected all migrant workers. National labour legislation was very clear in this regard. It provided for equal treatment and protection for migrant workers and nationals. His Government had no objection to the adoption of a resolution. However, he made a number of comments and expressed some reservations on its contents, which could be improved through the adoption of amendments, which he would submit to the Committee.

167. The Government member of Russian Federation welcomed the role played by the ILO in relation to migrant workers and said that its activities should be strengthened in the years to come in anticipation of an influx of migrant workers from Eastern and Central Europe. The ILO should monitor and analyse migratory flows and assist member States in dealing with labour migration problems with due respect to the provisions of relevant ILO instruments, as well as to the United Nations Convention on migrants. Furthermore, the ILO could assist member States in the conclusion of bilateral agreements on migration for employment and could provide them with information on the experiences of other countries. He concluded by affirming his Government's support for the resolution.

168. The Government member of Namibia supported the resolution, which would contribute to the application of international conventions on the protection of the rights of migrant workers and their families. However, he drew attention to paragraph 2(h) and the operative part, which dealt with a specific situation and which should be redrafted in a more general way which omitted any reference to the United Nations Compensation Commission.

169. The Government member of the United States stated that migrant workers were frequently the victims of abuse and ill-treatment and that women in particular were the most disadvantaged of all migrant workers. Her Government believed that the protection of migrant workers should be the concern of all States, which should take the necessary steps to promote and protect their human rights. Furthermore, States should take steps to inform migrant workers of their rights, so that they were better able to protect themselves. The ILO, because of its mandate and expertise, was the most appropriate forum in which to consider questions relating to migrant workers. While the resolution contained many good points, her Government found it difficult to support some of its provisions. For example, she could not support the financial consequences that the resolution would have if it were adopted at a time when the ILO's budget was undergoing a period of zero growth and the Office had been requested to refrain from establishing new programmes. Speaking on behalf of the Government member of Switzerland and her own Government, she stated that the resolution did not make a sufficiently clear distinction between issues relating to migrants and those concerning refugees. She would submit the appropriate amendments.

170. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates, while recognising the importance of the resolution, considered that the wording of some paragraphs went too far. The text placed too much emphasis on the interests of labour exporting countries and too little on those of receiving countries. The preamble should be shortened by omitting certain qualifications which were not necessarily exact and which could prejudice cooperation between sending and receiving countries. Nor was the tone of the operative part appropriate, because it did not pay sufficient attention to the complex nature of the economic, social and cultural issues surrounding migration; nor did it distinguish between permanent and temporary migrations. Migrant workers enjoyed excellent working conditions in his country, and they were respected and well treated. However, they had to conform to national laws. For this reason, migrant workers came from all over the world to work in his country. His Government had no difficulty in supporting the resolution, provided that it was modified through the acceptance of amendments.

171. The Workers' member of Italy expressed the hope that the Committee would adopt the resolution in order to improve the situation of migrant workers. The ILO was the ideal forum in which to adopt international instruments with a view to ensuring the equality of migrant workers in respect of their working conditions. As a result of recent profound political and economic changes, and armed conflict, massive population movements would take place; the absence of international rules for the protection of migrant workers could come into dramatic focus. He also proposed that the migration and cultural policies of receiving countries should be more closely coordinated.

172. The Government member of Canada observed that, although his country had a long-standing policy of accepting permanent immigrants, rather than temporary migrant workers, the problem of migrant workers had taken on worldwide dimensions, and his Government favoured the adoption of a resolution on this subject. However, the draft text contained provisions that would have unwelcome financial consequences for the ILO. He would be supporting some amendments on this aspect.

173. After having noted the importance of the issues dealt with by the resolution, the Employers' member of Kuwait said that one of the major problems of migrant workers concerned employment agencies in their countries of origin. These agencies often sent workers who did not have the required qualifications to the receiving countries. In certain cases, the agencies were themselves illegal. Illegal migration gave rise to related problems, which should be taken into account in the draft resolution. He drew attention to the underlying facts referred to in operative paragraph 2(h) which he considered ambiguously worded.

174. The Government member of France supported the observations made by the Government member of Italy. His Government supported the spirit of the resolution, although certain terms would have to be re-examined. He referred, in particular, to paragraph 2(b) of the operative part, which called for the Committee on Discrimination of the Governing Body to examine migrant labour questions, which might give rise to competition with the International Migration for Employment Branch and therefore result in a dispersion of effort.

175. While noting the importance of the draft resolution, the Government member of Japan expressed concern about some of its provisions. These included the financial implications of the draft text in an environment of zero growth, proposed activities for the Committee on Discrimination and the request to place migrant workers' issues on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference. He considered that such an intitiative would perhaps be premature and said that it would be preferable first of all to seek solutions at the national level in consultation with all the organisations concerned.

176. The Government member of Denmark observed that the subject of migrant workers was of crucial importance and was clearly within the mandate of the Organisation, which had already done very valuable work in that area. However, the resolution, which was the result of the merger of various texts, was too long and its content could be improved. For example, he raised the issue of the allocation of resources to activities relating to migrant workers. In the light of the zero-growth budget, the choice among priorities was inevitably restricted. However, an interdepartmental project on migrant workers was under preparation for the 1994-5 biennium, which might open up more favourable prospects for activities in this area. On the other hand, he did not consider it advisable to establish new standards on migrant workers, since several already existed. He stated his willingness to contribute to the development of a text that would be acceptable to the Committee and which could be adopted.

177. The Workers' member of France recalled that massive migrations were part of a permanent global process, the causes of which were closely related to the different levels of development in the various countries and regions. It was important not to permit the growth of parallel economies which resulted in "social dumping" and failed to address either employment or housing prolems, or family or cultural issues. The best weapon against racism and xenophobia was the harmonious integration of migrants in the receiving country. He gave his support to the resolution, which would contribute to achieving equality of rights and opportunities for migrant workers.

178. The Government member of Qatar said that his country was a receiving country and expressed his belief that many of the bilateral agreements that it had concluded with sending countries were fully compatible with the sentiments expressed in the draft resolution. However, some of its terminology raised a number of problems. He referred to the call that was made in the preamble for uniform guarantees and protection for migrant workers and their families and the reference to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Members of their Families, which should be removed. Referring to the operative part, he considered that the reference to freedom of association should be omitted. He agreed with previous speakers that the financial implications of the resolution raised difficulties in relation to the allocation of resources. Although he supported the resolution, its text would need amending.

179. The Workers' Vice-Chairman announced that his group would not submit amendments to the draft resolution. He noted that none of the members of the Committee denied the resolution's importance and that there therefore appeared to be a consensus that it was appropriate. The issue was now to produce a text which could be adopted. He systematically reviewed the comments and objections raised during the general discussion and indicated that on many points the Workers' group was willing to consider revising some of the terms or expressions in question. Regarding the financial implications of the resolution, he stated that the Committee's role was to provide policy guidance and that this matter had not been raised when the first resolution had been adopted, despite the fact that it, as any other resolution, had such implications. The Committee's terms of reference should not be confused with those of the Programme, Finance and Administration Committee of the Governing Body. With reference to the proposal that the Committee on Discrimination deal with questions relating to migrant workers, he noted that the idea was not new and that there were already precedents. The convening of a tripartite advisory meeting was justified so that the experts could provide guidance on future ILO policies. Operative paragraph 2(h) could be re-examined taking into consideration the views expressed during the general discussion. As regards the inclusion of the issue of migrant workers on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the Conference, the Worker's group was not specifically advocating the formulation of new standards. There were already many standards, although in many cases they had received few ratifications. The examination of the issue by the Conference could take other forms, for example it could be covered by the Director-General's Report, or by a general discussion.

Consideration of amendments

180. Eighty-four amendments, numbered from D.30 to D.113, were submitted for examination.

Amendment to the preamble

181. The Committee adopted the title and paragraph 1 of the preamble of the resolution without amendment.

182. Amendment D.68, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 2 by the following text: "Noting the standards embodied in the relevant ILO Conventions, including the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and in the accompanying Recommendations,".

183. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom made the general observation that, although a large number of amendments had been submitted by various members of the Committee, their purpose was not to impede the adoption of the resolution, but rather to remove difficulties from the text and to make it more focused and streamlined. The purpose of amendment D.68 was to take into account the fact that ILO member States were not under any obligation to ratify Conventions. They were obliged, however, to have regard to the standards embodied in international labour Conventions, not all of which were widely accepted or ratified.

184. The Workers' Vice-Chairman wondered what problems the members of the Committee could find in noting Conventions which had been adopted by the Conference. It was important to retain the reference in the paragraph to all five Conventions referred to therein. In order to accommodate the difficulties of some of the members of the Committee, he indicated that the Workers' group could accept the replacement of the phrase "Noting the protection guaranteed by", by the words "Noting the standards embodied in", as set out in amendment D.68.

185. The Government member of Australia informed the Committee that an exhaustive examination had been carried out of ILO Conventions in his country, and that three of five Conventions listed in the text of the original paragraph were among those which his country would be unlikely to ratify. However, he could accept the wording put forward by the previous speaker.

186. The Government member of the United Kingdom, while supporting the wording suggested by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, proposed that the first lines of the paragraph should read: "Noting the standards embodied in the relevant ILO Conventions, including", followed by the list of the five Conventions contained in the original text.

187. The Government member of Belgium, who had submitted amendment D.46, which referred to the same paragraph, stated that in his view the original paragraph went too far in its references to Conventions. A large number of countries had not ratified Conventions Nos. 118, 143 or 157, including his own country. Conventions Nos. 97 and 111 were, however, more closely related to the subject-matter covered in the draft resolution, as were the corresponding Recommendations. Reference to these instruments should therefore be retained.

188. In response to a question by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and a number of government members, the Chairman ruled that where a number of amendments had been submitted to the same paragraph, the Committee would consider them one at a time. If an amendment to replace or delete a paragraph were adopted, the remaining amendments to the paragraph in question would be dropped on the grounds that the Committee would not wish to call into question a decision that it had only just made.

189. Amendment D.68, as sub-amended by the Government member of the United Kingdom, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.46, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, fell.

190. Amendment D.49, submitted by the Government member of France and seconded by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, sought to replace, in the first line of paragraph 3, the word "Endorsing" by the word "Noting".

191. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of France explained the most of the members of the Committee had not been present at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference in Bangkok in 1991 when the resolution referred to in the text had been adopted. It was not the role of the Committee to "endorse" a resolution adopted by an ILO regional conference. Moreover, the resolution in question gave some of the members of the Committee a number of difficulties.

192. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that some of the members of his group who had been present at the Asian Regional Conference strongly disagreed with a number of provisions of the resolution that had been adopted there. Although he understood that the Governing Body had taken note of the resolution in question and had called for it to be circulated to employers' and workers' organisations, he was very much opposed to this Committee doing more than "noting" the text concerned.

193. Amendment D.49, which was identical to amendment D.61 submitted by the government member of the United States and amendment D.83 submitted by the Employers' group, was adopted.

194. Amendment D.48, submitted by the Government member of Nigeria, sought to add to the end of paragraph 3 the words "and the resolution on African migrant workers adopted by the 15th OAU Labour Commission in Addis Ababa, 11 to 16 May, 1992.".

195. In the absence of its author the amendment was seconded and moved by the Government member of the United Kingdom. Following a number of observations to the effect that the members of the Committee were unaware of the contents of the resolution in question, amendment D.48 was not adopted.

196. Amendment D.69, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 4 by the following text: "Recalling previous relevant resolutions concerning migrant workers adopted by the Conference in 1967 and 1971.".

197. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom said that the purpose of the amendment was once again to make the resolution shorter and more focused.

198. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to support the amendment on the understanding that its underlying purpose was brevity.

199. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also supported the amendment and as a consequence withdrew amendment D.84, which had addressed the same paragraph.

200. Amendment D.69 was adopted.

201. Amendment D.70, submitted by the government members of the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to delete paragraph 6.

202. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom noted that her delegation had a number of problems with the present paragraph. In the first place, she doubted that States were able to create employment directly. She also questioned the use of the term "countries of emigration" and had difficulties in accepting the phrase "the need to migrate".

203. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that the present paragraph went to the root of the problem. Although his group could accept a different wording for the original text, it rejected the present amendment and wondered whether amendment D.85 might be acceptable.

204. The Government member of the United States pointed to the words "underlining the importance of" as a source of concern to her delegation. She would be more prepared to accept a term such as "noting".

205. Having received assurances from both Vice-Chairmen of a willingness to discuss amendment D.85, the Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew amendment D.70.

206. Amendment D.85, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to add at the end of paragraph 6 the words "and to ensure that international migration takes place under conditions designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment.".

207. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that in the view of his group the current text of the paragraph needed completing. They had therefore proposed an addition which included language from the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

208. The Government member of the Netherlands proposed to sub-amend the text by replacing the words "Underlining the importance of" by the word "Noting".

209. Amendment D.85 was adopted as sub-amended.

210. Amendment D.71, submitted by the Government member of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 7 by the following text: "Considering that with increased economic and labour market integration, countries should consider questions relating to migrant workers and may need to cooperate in tackling any problems;"

211. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom noted that although she could accept the underlying idea in the original text of increased integration and appropriate cooperation, she had some difficulties with the language used. In particular, the word "interdependence" was rather strong, and she was not convinced that the word "necessitates" was appropriate. Individual countries had a right to formulate and adopt their own policies, which might well differ from those of other countries. In order to accommodate other views, she proposed to sub-amend the amendment by adding the words "more effectively" after the words "to cooperate".

212. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, although not opposed to clarifying the original text, explained that the term "interdependence" was broader than "integration" and denoted, not the formal links signified by integration, but a de facto linkage between economies and societies. The use of the term "integration" in this context indicated more binding institutional arrangements.

213. The Employers' Vice-Chairman drew the attention of the Committee to the language used in the amendment which his group had submitted to the same paragraph and which sought to avoid the term "interdependence". After a brief discussion in which a number of Government members expressed their support for the language used in the amendment submitted by the Employers' group, the Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.71 to read as follows: "Considering that with increasing economic integration and the movement of workers between countries, countries should consider questions relating to migrant workers and may need to cooperate more effectively in tackling any problems,".

214. Amendment D.71 was adopted as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman. As a consequence, amendment D.86 submitted by the Employers' group and amendment D.101 submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, which addressed the same paragraph, both fell.

215. Amendment D.102, submitted by the Government members of Germany, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, sought to delete paragraph 8.

216. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom explained that the original text was extremely negative. The authors of the amendment believed that it was better to delete the negative references from this part of the resolution and to place emphasis in the rest of the resolution on the need for fair treatment for migrant workers.

217. The Workers' Vice-Chairman did not agree with the purpose of the amendment. The text, which was almost quoted directly from a report of the Director-General to the Governing Body, referred to problems which were very real and which called for urgent action. However, his group would be willing to improve the wording of the original text.

218. The Government member of the Netherlands expressed a preference for retaining the paragraph and improving its formulation.

219. On the understanding that the Committee would discuss the other amendments submitted to the paragraph, the Government member of the United Kingdom withdrew amendment D.102.

220. Amendment D.62, submitted by the Government member of the United States and seconded by the Government member of Germany, sought to replace paragraph 8 by the following text: "Endorsing the need for international labour standards to be applied uniformly to all workers in all regions and condemning discrimination for migrant workers and their families wherever this occurs,".

221. The Government member of the United States informed the Committee that the purpose behind her amendment was to replace a rather negative text by a more positive wording. The original text had the defect of passing judgement on certain unspecified regions. Moreover, it would be difficult to ensure "uniform guarantees".

222. The Workers' Vice-Chairman once again expressed a preference for retaining the original wording of the paragraph.

223. The Employers' Vice-Chairman preferred amendment D.72, which also addressed paragraph 8.

224. The Government member of the Netherlands also found the proposed wording contained in amendment D.72 to be more appropriate.

225. The Government member of the United States withdrew amendment D.62 in favour of amendment D.72.

226. Amendment D.72, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 8 by the following text: "Reaffirming the need for fair treatment of all workers, including migrant workers, and condemning discrimination against migrant workers and their families wherever this occurs,".

227. The Government member of Germany, introducing the amendment, stated that the original text of paragraph 8 was very negative in tone. Moreover, the situation referred to in the original text existed only in certain countries and it was therefore inappropriate to make a general comment on it. The proposed amendment attempted to set out a more positive approach.

228. After an exchange of views between several members of the Committee, the sponsors of amendment D.72 agreed to withdraw it in favour of amendment D.87.

229. Amendment D.87, submitted by the Employers' group, also addressed paragraph 8, in which it proposed to: (i) replace, in the first line, the word "Deploring", by the word "Concerned"; (ii) replace, in the first line, the word "regions" by the words "countries may"; (iii) replace, in the second and third lines, the words "international labour" by the words "relevant ILO"; (iv) replace, in the fifth line, the word "those" by the word "such"; (v) replace, in the sixth line, the words "ensure uniform guarantees and" by the word "extend"; and (vi) add, at the end of the paragraph, the work "everywhere".

230. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, believed that the text could be acceptable to his group if it were sub-amended to read as follows: "Concerned that migration can embody practices which are not in keeping with the principles embodied in relevant ILO standards and considering that there is need to ensure that the conditions of recruitment and employment of migrant workers are in line with those principles,".

231. The Employers' Vice-Chairman supported the above sub-amended text.

232. Amendment D.87, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

233. Amendment D.32, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, which also addressed paragraph 8, was withdrawn by its authors.

234. Amendment D.33, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, sought to replace paragraph 9 by the following text: "Expressing concern about the discrimination in employment to which migrant workers are often exposed,".

235. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Kuwait said that the original text included much strong language, such as the terms "condemning", "racism" and "xenophobia", which were less appropriate than a mention of discrimination. He referred to various definitions of these terms and noted that the Gulf States were among one of the main areas of labour-receiving countries in that part of the region and did not allow practices such as those referred to in the original text. Their labour laws protected the labour relations and rights of migrant workers. Moreover, in the event of disputes, migrant workers were entitled to seek remedies from appropriate courts.

236. The Government member of Turkey expressed some difficulties in accepting that the text proposed in amendment D.33 was indeed an amendment to paragraph 9, since its text and contents were completely different from the original. It could not therefore be regarded as an amendment.

237. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, although sympathising with the views expressed by the previous speaker, wondered whether both the original text and the wording proposed in the amendment could not be combined. He also noted that the concepts of "racism" and "xenophobia" were very clear. The original text did not specify where these phenomena occurred, but it was well known that migrant workers were often exposed to them.

238. The Government member of Germany agreed that amendment D.33 introduced a totally new idea. He noted that to a very large extent the treatment of migrant workers was free of discrimination in employment and that the only difference between migrant and national workers was the need for a work permit. He could not therefore accept the amendment as it stood.

239. The Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that his group had certain difficulties with the text of paragraph 9 and did not believe that the term "xenophobia" was very widely understood.

240. The Government member of the Netherlands expressed reservations concerning the manner in which the terms "racism" and "xenophobia" were employed in the original text. The paragraph should express concern about acts of discrimination based on racism and xenophobia.

241. The Government member of Pakistan agreed with the previous speaker that the paragraph should refer to discrimination against migrant workers. The two terms contained in the original text, namely, "racism" and "xenophobia", although different from discriminations, also referred to important problems. The final wording of the text should, therefore, combine the two ideas. He also confirmed that the terms "racism" and "xenophobia" were in common use in the United Nations system and stated that it was important to condemn them.

242. The Government members of the United Arab Emirates and Qatar reaffirmed their objections to the use of the term "condemning", which should only be employed after investigations had been undertaken to ascertain whether such practices occurred. They also objected to the use of the terms "racism" and "xenophobia".

243. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic suggested that the text should condemn any attempts related to racism and xenophobia encountered by migrant workers.

244. The Government member of the Philippines believed that the ideas expressed in both the original text and the proposed amendment could be combined. The terms "racism" and "xenophobia" were accepted United Nations phraseology, although she would be able to support a change in the term "condemning" in the spirit of compromise.

245. After a number of variations on the wording of the amendment had been suggested, the Employers' Vice-Chaiman proposed to sub-amend it to read as follows: "Expressing concern about acts of racism and xenophobia and the discrimination in employment to which migrant workers may sometimes be exposed,".

246. The Government member of Denmark reaffirmed that racism and xenophobia occurred frequently and needed to be condemned at every opportunity.

247. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates supported the proposal made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

248. The Government member of Turkey preferred to retain the term "condemning", since any act of racism needed to be condemned.

249. The Government member of the United States agreed that the terms "racism" and "xenophobia" were used in the United Nations system to denote phenomena which existed throughout the world and should be condemned.

250. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed deep concern that members of the Committee found it difficult to condemn such practices as racism and xenophobia. The Workers' group could not accept a weakening of the text in the manner proposed. He called for a vote on the amendment.

251. Amendment D.33, as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was put to a vote by show of hands. There were 5,985 votes for and 567 votes against. As the total number of votes exceeded the required quorum of 6,048, amendment D.33, as sub-amended, was adopted.

252. As a result of the adoption of amendment D.33, as sub-amended, amendment D.30 submitted by the Government member of Turkey and amendment D.103 submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland, which addressed the same paragraph, both fell.

253. Amendment D.73, submitted by the Government members of the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to delete paragraph 10.

254. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom described the original paragraph as very negative in tone. Its wording did not convey a fair description of the problem and did not recognise that migration was sometimes illegal and that sanctions needed to be taken against illegal migrant workers as well as those who employed and recruited them. The whole question of illegal migration was an area in which it would be very difficult for the ILO to achieve any direct results. However, in response to a suggestion by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, she agreed to withdraw amendment D.73 on the understanding that a more acceptable text could be negotiated on the basis of D.88.

255. Amendment D.88, submitted by the Employers' group, sought in paragraph 10: (i) to replace the word "suppliers" by the words "labour recruiting agents in sending countries"; (ii) to replace the word "users" by the word "employers"; and (iii) to replace the word "labour" with the words "migrant workers".

256. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that its purpose was to propose language that was appropriate to the ILO without diminishing the fact that effective means were needed to combat the problem in question.

257. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed to sub-amend the amendment to read as follows: "Calling for effective means to eliminate illegal migration, including through measures against labour recruiting agencies, intermediaries and employers of illegal migrant workers,"

258. The Government member of Nigeria proposed to add to the above text, after the words "including through", the word "effective".

259. The Workers' Vice-Chairman further sub-amended the above text by adding the words "for employment", so that the paragraph would read as follows: "Calling for effective means to eliminate illegal migration for employment, including through effective measures against labour recruiting agents, intermediaries and employers of illegal migrant workers,".

260. Amendment D.88, as sub-amended, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.34, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, which addressed the same paragraph, fell.

261. Amendment D.74, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 11 by the following text: "Convinced that the ILO has an important and valuable role to play in international efforts, including those of the United Nations system, concerning the welfare of migrant workers and their families,".

262. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Germany noted that the first part of the original text of the paragraph exaggerated the role that the ILO would be called upon to play in the United Nations system in this context and might have the effect of restricting initiatives by other United Nations agencies. The second part of the original text referred to persons displaced by hostilities rather than migrant workers. Those displaced by hostilities were more properly covered by the mandate of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. ILO action in this respect should be confined to migrant workers and their families.

263. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that his group could support the proposed amendment provided that the words "and the fundamental rights of all" were included before the words "migrant workers", and if the words "including those displaced by hostilities" were added at the end of the paragraph.

264. In response, the Government member of Germany was prepared to accept the first part of the above sub-amendment, but not the second, which was totally unacceptable. It was not the place of the text before the Committee to define why migrant workers had left their countries of origin. He repeated that ILO action should be for all migrant workers and should not be confined to certain categories of them.

265. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also supported the first part of the sub-amendment proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, but not the inclusion of the reference to migrant workers displaced by hostilities.

266. The Government member of Denmark noted that if all migrant workers were covered by the resolution, then those displaced by hostilities were included whether or not they were mentioned specifically.

267. The Workers' Vice-Chairman explained that there had been a misunderstanding and that the words "those displaced by hostilities" were intended to refer to workers who already had migrated for employment and had been forced to leave the receiving countries as a result of hostilities. However, his group would be prepared to accept the text as sub-amended to read: "Convinced that the ILO has an important and valuable role to play in international efforts, including those of the United Nations system, concerning the welfare and the fundamental rights of all migrant workers and their families;".

268. The Government member of Pakistan believed that the purpose behind the original text of the paragraph was to promote the welfare of migrant workers displaced by hostilities. Although the UNHCR was clearly responsible for looking after refugees, the rehabilitation of workers and the provision of long-term assistance to them lay within the mandate of the ILO.

269. Amendment D.74, as sub-amended, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.50 submitted by the Government member of France, amendment D.89 submitted by the Employers' group and amendment D.104 submitted by the Government members of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Switzerland, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

270. Amendment D.75, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 12 by the following text: "stressing the need for employers' and workers' organisations to be associated where appropriate in the work of nationals, regional and international bodies concerned with questions affecting migrant workers and members of their families;".

271. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands said that its purpose was to make it clear that employers' and workers' organisations should only be associated with the work in question where appropriate.

272. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to accept the amendment if the words "where appropriate" could be replaced by the words "wherever relevant".

273. Amendment D.75, as sub-amended, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.90 submitted by the Employers' group, amendment D.105 submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the United States, and amendment D.55 submitted by the Government members of Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

274. The preamble, as amended, was adopted.

Amendments to the operative part

275. Amendment D.35, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Quatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, sought to replace, in paragraph 1(a), the words "to take all", by the words "to consider the possibility of taking".

276. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates said that its purpose was to remove the obligatory nature of the paragraph. He emphasised that the terms and conditions of employment of migrant workers were related essentially to their wages and the legal framework of their employment. He also noted that migration for employment was often of a temporary nature. It would also be more appropriate for the text to be confined to mentioning the ILO instruments which were relevant to migrant workers.

277. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.35 by replacing the words "to consider the possibility of taking" by the words "to take all appropriate".

278. Amendment D.35 was adopted as sub-amended.

279. Amendment D.63, which proposed a similar change to paragraph 1(a), was withdrawn by the Government member of the United States.

280. Amendment D.44, submitted by the Government members of Belgium and Italy, sought to make one change which affected only the French text and to add, after the words "provisions of" in the last line, the word "certain".

281. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Belgium said that the text should refer only to the relevant ILO Conventions.

282. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend the text by adding the word "the" before the words "relevant ILO instruments".

283. Amendment D.44, as sub-amended, was adopted.

284. Amendment D.76, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, sought to delete Operative paragraph 1(b).

285. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Germany explained that the original text was particularly unacceptable for a number of reasons. It called upon member States to ratify and implement fully a series of ILO Conventions as well as the International Convention and the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. He reaffirmed that governments took very seriously their obligations under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution to examine the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference and to consider and review periodically the question of their ratification. However, some of the instruments referred to in the paragraph were relatively old and had received very few ratifications. It was not therefore appropriate for the resolution to seek to influence the manner in which governments carried out their obligations under the ILO Constitution. With regard to the international Convention on migrant workers, he emphasised that it was totally unacceptable to his Government and that any reference to it in the text of the resolution would encounter severe resistance from his and a number of other Government delegations. In response to a suggestion by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, he stated that al-

t D.76 in its favour.

D.64, submitted by the govern-
United States, and seconded by e-Chairman, sought to replace ne following text: "to consider nt ILO Conventions concerning workers and their families;".

D.64 was adopted. As a result, ubmitted by the Government amendment D.36 submitted by mbers of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qal the United Arab Emirates, and ubmitted by the Employers' orkers; the religious practices in those countries required all concerned to refrain from making any discrimination. Although there would always be isolated acts of racism, the manner of approaching the problem should not be through the formulation and strict application of rigid rule, but rather through undertaking studies and surveys at the workplace and through information campaigns. These latter measures were likely to be more effetive than those called for in the original text. In the Gulf States, many migrant workers stayed for a very long time. They suffered no discrimination based on unfair treatment. In response to a suggestion by the Workers' Vice-Chairman that amendment D.92 would be a more suitable basis for a compromise text, the Government member of Kuwait agreed to withdraw amendment D.37.

297. Amendment D.92, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace in paragraph 1(e) the words "formulate and apply strictly laws and regulations", with the words "take appropriate action", and to replace the words "racism and xenophobia", with the words "discrimination against migrant workers".

298. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that his group was not convinced that the mere formulation and application of laws was the correct manner of changing attitudes. The proposed wording covered all forms of action. The reference to discrimination also covered all forms of discrimination against migrant workers and not only racism and xenophobia.

299. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.92 to read as follows: "to formulate and apply relevant legislative and other action to prevent all acts of racism and xenophobia against migrant workers, and to intensify information and educational activities to this end;".

300. The Government member of the United Kingdom found the above formulation acceptable, but preferred to use the term "combat", rather than "prevent".

301. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a further sub-amendment, so that the first phrase would read "to take appropriate action, which may include legislation, to combat".

302. The Government member of the Netherlands, in supporting the above sub-amendments, withdrew amendment D.107.

303. The Government member of Turkey, who also supported the above sub-amendments, withdrew amendment D.31.

304. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates also agreed with the proposed text.

305. Amendment D.92 was adopted as sub-amended to read: "to take appropriate action, which may include legislation, to combat all acts of racism and xenophobia against migrant workers, and to intensify information and educational activities to this end;".

306. Amendment D.77, submitted by the Goverment members of Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 1(f) by the following text: "to ensure that migrant workers have access to information on their rights, including where appropriate in their own languages;".

307. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom explained that its purpose was to emphasise that information on the rights of migrant workers should not only be available, but should also be accessible to those concerned. It should also be in a language that they understood.

308. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to replace the words "where appropriate", by the words "where necessary".

309. Amendment D.77, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.38 submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, amendment D.108 submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the United States, amendment D.45 submitted by the Government members of Belgium and Italy and amendment D.93 submitted by the Employers' group, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

310. Amendment D.94, submitted by the Employers' group, sought in paragraph 1(g) to: (i) replace the words "ensure the involvement" in the first line, with the word "consult"; (ii) delete the words "and implementation" in the second and third lines; and (iii) replace in the third to last lines the words "regarding the recruitment, employment, working conditions and integration of migrant workers", by the words "designed to protect migrant workers and their families".

311. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that his group's difficulty with the original text concerned the expression "ensure the involvement of workers' and employers' organisations" in the formulation and implementation of all the policies concerned. His group proposed that it was more appropriate for the organisations concerned to be consulted on these matters. Moreover, they doubted whether it was correct to speak of their "involvement" in the implementation of such policies. The proposed amendment had the merit of broadening the scope of the paragraph.

312. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend amendment D.94 to read as follows: "to involve through apropriate means workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and the monitoring of the effects of policies which cover recruitment, employment and the working conditions of migrant workers".

313. The Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that the word "implementation" had been replaced by the phrase "monitoring the effects of", and could accordingly support the proposed wording.

314. Amendment D.94, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted. As a consequence, amendment D.39 submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates and amendment D.109 submitted by the Government members of Germany, Switzerland and the United States, which addressed the same paragraph, both fell.

315. Operative paragraph 1 was adopted as amended.

316. Amendment D.56, submitted by the Government members of Canada, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 2(a) by the following text: "to make appropriate provisions in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium for activities for the protection of the rights of migrant workers".

317. Introducing the amendment, the government member of the United Kingdom said that the authors of the amendment had found that the original paragraph tended to prejudge the positions that could be taken by the Director-General and the Governing Body in the allocation of resources in the programme and budget proposals for 1994-95. It also included terms, such as "due", "increased" and "commensurate" which tended to prejudge the action that was called for.

318. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that he had listened carefully to the concerns expressed on this point in the general discussion of the resolution and therefore proposed to sub-amend amendment D.56 to read as follows: "to make the necessary provisions in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium for activities which can adequately address the need for the protection and promotion of migrant workers' rights;".

319. While welcoming the above wording, the Government member of the United Kingdom proposed to delete the word "adequately".

320. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to replace the word "adequately" by the word "appropriately".

321. Amendment D.56, as sub-amended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.65 submitted by the Government member of the United States, D.78 submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, D.51 submitted by the Government member of France, D.95 submitted by the Employers' group and D.110 submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

322. Amendment D.40, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, and amendment D.52, submitted by the Government members of Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States, both sought to delete paragraph 2(b).

323. Introducing amendment D.40, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates explained that its purpose was to reduce the financial burdens on the ILO budget, which was now established on the basis of zero growth.

324. The Government member of Germany, introducing amendment D.52, agreed with the previous speaker and added that he entertained serious doubts that the issue of migrant workers should be turned into an institutional part of the terms of reference of the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination. He noted that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the ILO supervisory machinery were entirely competent in matters pertaining to the application of international labour standards and the proposed action by the Committee on Discrimination would tend to duplicate their activities.

325. The Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that the original paragraph did not call for an increase in expenditure by the ILO. He expressed the readiness of his group to discuss the contents of amendment D.96, if their authors were prepared to withdraw amendments D.40 and D.52.

326. The Government member of Germany, taking into account the assurance given by the previous speaker, withdrew amendment D.52.

327. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates withdrew amendment D.40 under the same understanding.

328. Amendment D.96, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace in paragraph 2(b) the words following "Governing Body" by the words "a report on the conditions of migrant workers, and to make proposals regarding any appropriate action that may need to be taken where these are not in conformity with ILO instruments;".

329. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that many of the reasons described by the previous speakers applied to amendment D.96.

330. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, in response to the concerns voiced by the Government member of Germany, proposed to subamend amendment D.96 to read as follows: "to present to an early session of the Governing Body a report on the conditions of migrant workers, to make proposal regarding any appropriate action to be taken when these are not in conformity with the principles embodies in relevant ILO instrument, and to keep the Governing Body informed at regular intervals on matters pertaining to these issues;".

331. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that his group was prepared to agree to the above text if it met with the approval of the rest of the Committee.

332. Amendment D.96, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

333. Amendment D.41, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, and amendment D.53, submitted by the Government member of Canada, France, Germany, Italy and the Netherlands, both sought to delete paragraph 2(c).

334. Introducing amendment D.41, the Government member of the United Arab Emirates explained that it had been inspired by the same reasons as amendment D.40.

335. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed that it might be more productive for the Committee to base its discussions on amendment D.111. He therefore called for their authors to withdraw amendments D.41 and D.53 on the understanding that their concerns would be noted in a text based on amendment D.111.

336. The Government member of Germany withdrew amendment. D.53.

337. The Government member of the United Arab Emirates withdrew amendment D.41.

338. Amendment D.111, submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland, sought to replace paragraphs 2(c), (f) and (g) by the following text: "2(c) to continue the ILO's dialogue with the other international institutions concerned and to intensify cooperation with these institutions on matters affecting migrant workers to provide guidance on future policies and activities in this field;".

339. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Germany said that one of the principle reasons for seeking a change in the original text of paragraph 2(c) was that it called for another large meeting to be convened on the subject of migrant workers. Many such meetings had been held and were continuing to be held, and he doubted the utility of convening another. The proposed wording placed emphasis on the continuation of the ILO's dialogue and cooperation with other international institutions.

340. The Workers' Vice-Chairman saw the merits of combining the ideas contained in various paragraphs. However, the original text of paragraphs 2(f) and (g) had contained some important ideas which should be retained. He proposed to subamend amendment D.111 to read as follows: "to intensify ILO cooperation with other international institutions concerned on policies affecting migrant workers, including social and economic policies and employment creation in all countries, and to provide guidance for this by convening at an early date an ad hoc tripartite advisory meeting of representatives from both sending and receiving countries, as well as the relevant international institutions;".

341. The Government member of the Netherlands was prepared to accept the above wording with the addition of the phrase "including the International Organisation for Migration". However, he doubted that the meeting proposed in the second part of the suggested paragraph would be successful. Reference to such a meeting should therefore be deleted.

342. The Government members of Germany and Italy supported the above speaker. The Government member of Germany added that an idea expressed in amendment D.111 had been omitted from the proposed new wording; the ILO was already undertaking good work in this context which should be continued. He therefore suggested that the paragraph should commence with the phrase "to continue and where appropriate to intensify".

343. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed concern about the meeting referred to in the second part of the wording proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. If the meeting was similar in intent to the World Employment Programme, his group was opposed to it.

344. In order to take into account the concerns voiced by the previous speaker, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed that the second part of the paragraph shoud read: "and to consider appropriate measures to provide the necessary tripartite guidance for the ILO input in this area".

345. Amendment D.111, as subamended, was adopted. Paragraph 2(c) therefore read as follows: "to continue and where appropriate intensify ILO cooperation with other international institutions concerned, including the International Organisation for Migration (IOM), on policies affecting migrant workers, including social and economic policies and employment creation in all countries, and to consider appropriate measures to provide the necessary tripartite guidance for the ILO input in this area;".

346. As a result, amendment D.97 submitted by the Employers' group, which also addressed paragraph 2(c), amendment D.58 submitted by the Government members of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, amendment D.67 submitted by the Government member of the United States, and amendment D.80 submitted by the Government members of Germany, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which all addressed paragraph 2(f), and amendment D.81 submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, which addressed paragraph 2(g), all fell.

347. Amendment D.57, submitted by the Government members of Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to delete paragraph 2(d).

348. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom said that it was motivated by many of the considerations underlying the previous amendments that she had proposed. The paragraph in question was prescriptive in tone and called for an increase in the provision of services. However, she withdrew the amendment on the understanding that a compromise text could be negotiated on the basis of amendment D.79.

349. Amendment D.79, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 2(d) by the following text: "to provide advisory services, monitoring and technical cooperation on migration issues, with the aim of helping governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to devise and apply effectively regulations to protect the rights and policies to promote the welfare of migrant workers;".

350. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands said that its purpose was to streamline the original paragraph. Moreover, advisory services should be given when asked for and where appropriate.

351. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was prepared to accept amendment D.79 if the word "adequate" could be added before the words "advisory services".

352. The Employers' Vice-Chairman drew attention to a problem area for his group to which he had alluded previously in the discussion, namely language which called upon employers' and workers' organisations to be involved in devising and applying regulations. This language was very similar to the implementation of regulations, which was not the role of employers' and workers' organisations. He therefore proposed to replace the words after "organisations" by the words "to formulate policies to protect the rights of migrant workers and to promote their welfare".

353. The Workers' Vice-Chairman upheld the view that the implementation of policies could also involve workers' and employers' organisations and therefore proposed that the relevant wording should be "to formulate and apply effectively".

354. In reply, the Employers' Vice-Chairman agreed to accept the wording "to formulate and apply effectively" provided that it applied only to policies and not to regulations.

355. Amendment D.79, as subamended, was adopted. The paragraph now read as follows: "to provide adequate advisory services, monitoring and technical cooperation on migration issues, with the aim of helping governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to formulate and apply effectively policies to protect the rights of migrant workers and to promote their welfare;". As a result, amendment D.66 submitted by the Government member of the United States, amendment D.98 submitted by the Employers' group, and amendment D.112 submitted by the Government members of Germany and Switzerland, which addressed the same paragraph, all fell.

356. Amendment D.42, submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Watar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, sought in paragraph 2(e) to delete the words ", and specifically on their right freely to join the trade union of their choice".

357. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Saudi Arabia emphasised that all the various aspects of the rights of migrant workers were very important, including social security and severance pay. No single right should be singled out in the text of the paragraph. The fact that all the rights concerned were not mentioned meant that the draft resolution was not sufficiently operational.

358. The Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that the proposed amendment was completely unacceptable and expressed outrage that any member of the Committee should wish to omit this reference to the right of migrant workers freely to joint the trade union of their choice.

359. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, although stressing that his group was not against the right of workers to join trade unions, wished to point out that the present text did not refer to the right of migrant employers to join associations. He proposed that such a reference should be included in the text, since many employers had also migrated for the purposes of their activity.

360. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed extreme concern that the Committee was even discussing the idea of taking out of the text of the resolution a reference to freedom of association. However, she could agree with the point made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

361. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that any change in the text would weaken it.

362. The Government member of Denmark, although fully agreeing with the remarks made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, felt that a reference to the rights embodied in ILO freedom of association instruments could also be included in the text. He proposed to add at the end of the text the words "as well as other rights of employers and workers embodied in ILO standards on freedom of association".

363. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic expressed the view that, since employers who had migrated were in the situation of employing other workers, they were no longer in a weak position and hardly needed protection. Moreover, the original paragraph concerned the promotion and protection of the rights of migrant workers.

364. The Government member of Romania said that he would support a reference to the right of freedom of association and the defence of the rights of migrant workers in the text, which should then cover migrant workers who also became employers.

365. Although expressing a preference for the original text, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to replace the words in the original text "their right freely to joint the trade union of their choice", by the words "their right to freedom of association".

366. Paragraph 2(e), as modified by the subamendment proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

367. Amendment D.59, submitted by the Government members of Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, sought to delete paragraph 2(h).

368. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands explained that the paragraph was out of place and that its deletion would make the resolution more concise and would focus it on issues relating only to migrant workers.

369. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed the belief that it was important to include a specific and real example that could help in comparable situations in the future. He therefore supported the retention of the paragraph, although his group would be prepared to discuss the proposal contained in amendment D.99.

370. The Government member of Iraq noted that the draft resolution was of a general nature and related to a persistent problem. The ILO had undertaken valuable work for the protection of migrant workers, irrespective of their national origin and the country in which they worked, in accordance with international labour standards. The Gulf conflict had been temporary situation concerning which the United Nations Security Council had adopted resolutions, of which the Compensation Fund was one illustration. Since the resolution was general in scope, he supported the deletion of the paragraph in question.

371. After the Employers' Vice-Chairman had expressed a preference for retaining the paragraph with the changes put forward in amendment D.99, the Government member of the United Kingdom noted that amendment D.59 did not enjoy the support of either the Employers' or the Workers' group and therefore withdrew it.

372. Amendment D.99, submitted by the Employers' group, sought in paragraph 2(h): (i) to delete the words ", in respect of the particular case of the Gulf conflict,"; (ii) to replace the word "done" by the word "undertaken"; and (iii) to replace in the fifth line the word "conflict" by the words "Gulf conflict of 1990-91".

373. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that its purpose was to give more focus to the text. He noted that the Gulf conflict of 1990-91 was an event which had occurred and needed to be taken into account.

374. The Employer member of Kuwait believed that the original paragraph needed to be strengthened. The Government member of Iraq had omitted to mention that his Government had not paid the compensation that was due.

375. Amendment D.99 was adopted.

376. Amendment D.54, submitted by the Government member of France and seconded by the Government member of Germany, sought to delete from paragraph 2(h) the words ", and to make similar provisions in any other such cases as may arise in the future".

377. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of France warned that the present wording of the paragraph might commit the Organisation to activities in the future of which it was impossible to gauge the scope or magnitude.

378. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to replace the words referred to in amendment D.54 by the words "and to draw conclusions from this experience for situations which may arise in the future".

379. Amendment D.54, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted. Paragraph 2(h) was adopted as amended.

380. Amendment D.60, submitted by the Government members of Canada, Italy, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, and amendment D.100 submitted by the Employers' group, both sought to delete paragraph 2(i).

381. Introducing amendment D.60, the Government member of Canada emphasised that decisions concerning the items to be included on the agenda of the Conference needed to be taken by the Governing Body in the context of a wide-ranging discussion of all the available options. It served no useful purpose to burden the Governing Body with a proposal for a single item.

382. The Workers' Vice-Chairman prefaced his comments by an expression of irritation that some Government members had sponsored more than one amendment to the same paragraph. He said that there was nothing wrong with proposing to discuss the subject of migrant workers at a future session of the International Labour Conference. Indeed, the suggestion of future items for the Conference was a very normal role for a resolution. The wording of the current text left sufficient flexibility for the subject to be considered in a variety of ways, such as in the Director-General's report. He suggested that the Committee might wish to base its deliberations on amendment D.82. However, he opposed the deletion of the paragraph.

383. Introducing amendment D.100, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the concern of his group was that the Governing Body should wait for the Director-General to study the matter in question before considering putting it on the agenda of the Conference. Amendment D.82 responded to these concerns, and he therefore withdrew amendment D.100.

384. The Government member of Denmark emphasised that governments were not a homogeneous group, but that they were very serious in submitting their amendments.

385. The Government member of Canada, noting that neither the Employers' nor the Workers' groups supported the deletion of the paragraph, withdrew amendment D.60.

386. Amendment D.82, submitted by the Government members of Germany and the United Kingdom, sought to replace paragraph 2(i) by the following text: "to continue to examine relevant migration issues and problems, and ways of tackling them, in appropriate fora of the ILO".

387. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom said that it had been motivated by similar reasons to those expressed by similar reasons to those expressed by the authors of the other amendments to the paragraph. The proposed wording attempted to broaden the text by including the possibility of the examination of the question in other appropriate ILO fora, though it did not rule out the possibility of these including the International Labour Conference.

388. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was prepared to accept the amendment provided that the words "all the" were included before the words "appropriate fora".

389. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic suggested that a reference should be made to encouraging governments to adhere to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families. However, in response to the comments of a number of Government members, she withdrew her suggestion.

390. Amendment D. 82, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted. As a consequence, amendment D.43 submitted by the Government members of Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, and amendment D.113 submitted by the Government members of Germany and Switzerland, which addressed the same paragraph, both fell.

391. The Operative part of the resolution was adopted as amended.

Adoption of the resolution

392. The resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families was adopted, as amended, by consensus.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE DEVELOPMENT OF DEMOCRACY, THE INTERNATIONALISATION OF THE ECONOMY AND THE PROMOTION OF TRIPARTISM

Presentation of the resolution

393. In presenting the resolution concerning the development of democracy, the internationalisation of the economy and the promotion of tripartism, the personal substitute of the Workers' delegate of Belgium pointed out that his group was the only one to propose a resolution on this subject. Its aim was to reinforce the role of employers' and workers' organisations in the development of democratisation and the internationalisation of the economy. The speaker highlighted four cases: in countries moving to a market economy, employers' and workers' organisations were not yet sufficiently well structured; in the formation of supranational structures in regions outside Europe, the role and impact of employers' and workers' organisations should be taken into account, as it had been in the social model established by agreement between employers and workers in the EEC; structural adjustment at national and international level should take account of social dialogue and tripartism; and employers' and workers' organisations in particular, and tripartism in general, should play an important role in the internationalisation of the economy. In these areas the ILO should take concrete action to reinforce the role of tripartism at national and international level.

General discussion

394. The draft resolution was seconded by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

395. The Workers' member of Belgium indicated that the draft resolution sought to reinforce tripartism in a totally new context. The new context was characterised by an unprecedented growth in democracy and was one of the greatest challenges of the end of the twentieth century. Frequently, it seemed that the growth of democracy went hand in hand with the application of market liberalism which failed to take into account the role of the social partners. The resolution also emphasised another new challenge that was often ignored: the role of tripartism in the internationalisation of the economy through multinational enterprises on the one hand, and in the internationalisation of financial systems on the other. Even the question of the environment had become internationalised, as demonstrated at the recent United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in Rio de Janeiro. Internationalisation tended to threaten national sovereignty, within which tripartism was exercised. To preserve tripartism, new mechanisms would be needed. In some regions new political and economic groupings were being formed, like that foreseen by the Maastricht agreement, which would exercise sovereignty in economic and social affairs at regional level. At that level tripartism was far from being established and applied. Workers demanded that, in the European Communities under the Maastricht agreement, tripartism should not be limited in any way and the laws of the relevant national legilsation should be respected. Tripartism had to be revitalised to counterbalance the market liberalism associated with national democratisation and political and economic internationalisation, and it was therefore necessary to take action. Nowhere had trade union rights been offered freely; they had always had to be won. In the light of this, operative paragraph 2 of the resolution asked the ILO to examine: the development since reforms had been introduced in central and eastern Europe; structural adjustment policies in the various continents, and particularly the organisation and representation of groups or activities in the informal sector; the effects of the internationalisation of the economy, the internationalisation of numerous economic and financial operators and the creation of supranational entities; the ways and means of promoting tripartism as well as bipartism through all ILO activities, especially technical cooperation; and the strengthening of the human and financial resources required for the Organisation to assume these crucial tasks. The ILO should be able to play its role fully in all international forums, such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the OECD, the G-24, the European Communities and the Lomé Convention, to communicate its philosophy of a new revitalised tripartism, adapted to the present time.

396. The Workers' Vice-Chairman informed the Committee that he would discuss the draft resolution with his group and propose amendments.

397. The Workers' member of Lithuania expressed his pleasure at being able to address the Committee on behalf of Lithuanian workers after 52 years of compulsory silence. He noted that the resolution was particularly important for "young" countries like his, which were "young" in the sense of democracy and labour relations. Resolutions adopted by the Conference would serve as guidelines for the development of democratic labour relations and democracy as a whole. In some cases, resolutions of the International Labour Conference and other ILO instruments were the only legal tools available for the development of democracy, as few laws and national practice existed. He supported the resolution on behalf of the workers of Lithuania. However, he asked the Committee members, when submitting amendments to the resolution, that they refrain from using the words "according to national law and practice", for, in the case of Lithuania, this would imply continuing the national practice of the former USSR of the past 52 years, and this could not be called "democratisation".

398. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that, at first impression, the resolution appeared to be concerned with theoretical matters and that the balance between ILO and non-ILO issues was out of kilter. Many of the subjects covered, such as internationalisation and the creation of supranational entities, did not appear to fall within the ILO's terms of reference. Secondly, the wording was unclear and demanded clarification. What for example was the meaning of "social efficiency" and what was, and how could one measure, "labour relations of a high calibre"? Thirdly, he queried the idea of the democratisation of economic and social life, particularly in public administration and in private enterprise, as it was not up to individuals to change the manifestos of democratically elected governments, nor should joint decision-making in private enterprise take the place of managerial responsibility. As for problems within the EEC and with the Maastricht agreement, mentioned by a previous speaker, an agreement between employers and workers on the development of social policy in the EEC had been reached on 31 October 1991. The protocol to the agreement had taken into account almost in toto the proposals made by the social partners. In his view, there was no lack of consultation within the OECD, where there were many committees which dealt with such issues as multinational enterprises and social policies. Furthermore, he wondered exactly where the "marginalisation" of social partners and "unbridled deregulation" had occurred, as mentioned in preambular paragraph 7. In response to the Workers' member of Lithuania, he mentioned the resolution concerning structural adjustment, industrial relations and economic and social development that had been adopted by the Conference in 1991. The idea of democratisation had also been developed by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference, but even that report was totally lacking in balance as it mentioned the protection of workers' rights and the need to provide a remedy for poverty but did not mention the role of enterprises in correcting these problems. He saw no reason for paragraph 2(a) of the operative part which called for the establishment of an ad hoc committee to evaluate the activities of the ILO and wondered if this was an attempt to create a supervisory committee for the Governing Body as well. While a resolution on democratisation might be acceptable, this particular text would need to be subtantially rewritten.

399. The Government member of Syria stated that democracy meant individual freedom of choice. It was therefore necessary to prepare people for democracy through increased consciousness, freedom from exploitation and a political environment in which the individual could develop and laws could be applied to help the community. In the Syrian Arab Republic training for democracy was given in popular organisations, trade unions and organisations representing young people, farmers and other professional groups. These groups worked together, within the framework of laws establishing their relations with society, towards equality of opportunity, equality between men and women, fighting unemployment, and improving working conditions and the well-being of workers. Thus tripartism formed the basis of democracy. The ILO's role should be to give advice to these social partners, provide training for their members and help them to play an active role in implementing the economic and social policy of government. Democracy would only succeed in an environment that allowed it to be exercised in a healthy manner.

400. The Government member of the United States said that his Government was naturally in favour of democracy. He called the Committee's attention to the address by the United States Secretary of Labor to the Conference, where she had stated that, as the current global movement toward democracy was, without question, the most significant event of our time, the Director-General could not have selected a more fitting topic or a more timely theme for the present session. The ILO's commitment to the idea of democracy was well known, and tripartism itself reflected democratic pluralism. He noted with pleasure the Director-General's emphasis on democracy in his Report to the Conference and at the February Session of the Governing Body. But however much he was in favour of the idea of democracy, the proposed resolution was flawed in many respects and contained paragraphs that were not particularly relevant to the subject under discussion. He would therefore present a number of amendments.

401. The Government member of the United Kingdom, while having no doubt that everyone believed in the development of democracy and the promotion of tripartism, indicated that her Government had serious reservations on some aspects of the text. For example, preambular paragraph 7 contained the words "fosters unbridled deregulation", which caused significant problems. Furthermore, the ILO could not be expected to do everything that was proposed in the operative part of the resolution. She was against the establishment of a new committee to do work that appeared complicated and was not clearly defined and pointed out that the ILO was already arranging a meeting in Poland to follow up on an earlier ILO symposium on tripartism in Europe. A number of amendments would therefore be necessary before the resolution could be adopted.

402. The draft resolution was discussed but, for lack of time, it was not possible to consider any amendments.

Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the obligation of the ILO to further programmes which will achieve, inter alia, full employment, the raising of standards of living, and a just share of the fruits of progress to all,

Recalling the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169),

Recalling also the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Recalling that the standards of the ILO relating to employment address all forms of productive activity which provide means of earning a livelihood,

Considering that continuing structural adjustment in the context of technological developments and changes in world markets requires intensified efforts to maximise employment opportunities in all countries,

Recognising that a key element in solving the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human skills including entrepreneurial and management skills, and the exercise of these skills by individuals, within the framework of policies that encourage the creation and growth of enterprises, especially small and medium-sized ones, that are competitive nationally, regionally and internationally,

Considering that there is a need for tripartite cooperation in the creation of an environment that would stimulate enterprise and investment, and through that, employment growth and improved living standards and working conditions, freedom of association and free collective bargaining,

Considering also that the full use of consultation between governments and the social partners, at all appropriate levels, greatly facilitates such cooperation and the achievement of these objectives,

Convinced of the need for government policies which provide the appropriate infrastructure and framework for economic and employment growth, investment and active labour market policies:

1. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to:

(a) promote economic, industrial, investment and employment policies, including active labour market policies, that provide an environment in which enterprise can develop and flourish and new small and medium-sized enterprises are established, so that self-sustaining new jobs, offering full, productive and freely chosen employment can be created, and living standards and working conditions can be improved;

(b) make full use of consultation in the formulation of such policies;

(c) encourage constructive industrial relations systems, including collective bargaining systems where relevant, in order to facilitate the implementation of these policies;

(d) improve employment services and training and retraining programmes;

(e) take appropriate measures to encourage an entrepreneurial approach and the necessary skills for enterprise development, in particular through training and retraining programmes;

(f) devote particular attention to measure which will assist the most marginalised sections in society, such as women and rural workers, to find employment opportunities.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special emphasis, when implementing the programme of the ILO and when planning future activities, to:

(i) activities that promote the development of appropriate economic and employment policies that would:

    (A) encourage an entrepreneurial approach and the necessary skills for enterprise development, especially in small and medium-sized enterprises, with a view to expanding sustainable and productive employment;

(B) enhance the potential of enterprise in the creation of full productive, and freely chosen employment; and

(C) help to improve living standards and working conditions;

(ii) training and retraining programmes directed towards enabling unemployed people, including new entrants to the workforce, those displaced by structural adjustment and those in marginalised sections of society, to acquire the necessary skills and qualifications to find employment or re-employment or to start their own economic activities;

(iii) activities fostering the creation of new enterprises as a significant means of re-employing people who may lose their jobs in the process of structural adjustment, as well as providing employment for new entrants to the workforce;

(b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting as essential elements of their economic and employment policies, in order to increase opportunities for sustainable and productive employment:

(A) a diversified and efficient market economy;

(B) the promotion and encouragement of the creation and development of enterprises without unnecessary regulation and excessive bureaucratic interference;

(C) the promotion of freedom of association and free and voluntary collective bargaining;

(D) facilities for, and the promotion of, adequate consultations between the social partners, at all appropriate levels, on how to cope with and facilitate the implementation of structural adjustment in the labour market;

(E) the full incorporation of adequate social considerations into economic programmes.

Resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of overall development

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment",

Recalling the ILO's responsibility, according to the Declaration of Philadelphia, to promote programmes which will achieve full employment, and the fact that the Preamble to the Constitution of the Organisation advocates the prevention of unemployment and the provision of an adequate living wage, and reaffirming continuous support for the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122),

Considering that the International Labour Organisation affirmed in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "the attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy", and further affirmed that it was the responsibility of the Organisation "to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective",

Recalling the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987,

Recalling also ILO standards on employment policy,

Noting with concern the decline in employment opportunities in various regions of the world and the increase in unemployment and underemployment in several industrialised countries as well as in developing countries and countries in transition,

Recognising the need to ensure respect for the principles contained in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), and the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141),

Recognising the responsibility of governments in the field of development policy and in the promotion of an environment which stimulates growth and employment and the importance of consultation with employers' and workers' organisations in the formulation of relevant policies in these areas;

1. Urges governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to formulate and apply, as a matter of priority, an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, through sustained economic growth and development, and thereby raise the standard of living of the population;

(b) to adopt policies which encourage job-creative economic activities, in line with national policies and development criteria; to develop employment and vocational guidance services so as to facilitate access to the labour market;

(c) to continue and intensify efforts to devise coherent training systems and policies;

(d) to develop social, employment and training programmes that would help to prepare the entry of young people into working life and the reintegration in the labour market of the long-term unemployed, workers displaced by restructuring or reconversion and workers who have interrupted their working life for various reasons, such as family responsibilities;

(e) to take appropriate measures to ensure that employment conditions in all categories of establishments respect the principles of ILO labour standards;

(f) to increase economic cooperation between countries which are at different stages of economic development;

(g) to promote long-term development of world trade on a fair basis, as a means of increasing economic activity and thus to increase employment opportunities, improve living standards and eliminate hunger and poverty;

(h) to develop a market-oriented macroeconomic environment as a means of solving problems of unemployment and developing overall growth.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) encourage member States to establish a framework for substantial employment growth, in both quantitative and qualitative terms, and to take the appropriate economic and social policy measures at the national and international levels and, for this purpose, to advise member States on the means of achieving their objectives as regards employment and the meeting of basic needs;

(b) assess the developments since the adoption of the World Employment Programme, taking especially into account the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987, and submit relevant proposals for action to the Governing Body at an early date;

(c) continue and strengthen training activities at the national and regional levels, ensuring the optimum distribution and enhanced effectiveness of these programmes;

(d) cooperate fully with other organisations of the United Nations system in the search for solutions to problems of employment and the meeting of basic needs.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the right sof migrant workers and their families

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Guided by the recognition in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution of the urgent need to protect the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own,

Noting the standards embodied in the relevant ILO Conventions, including the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and by the accompanying Recommendations,

Noting the resolution on migrant workers in Asia adopted by the 11th Asian Regional Conference of the ILO (Bangkok, 26 November-2 December 1991),

Recalling previous relevant resolutions concerning migrant workers adopted by the Conference in 1967 and 1971,

Recalling also the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1990 (resolution 45/158) of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, to which the ILO made a positive contribution,

Noting the terms of the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), which calls on Members to create more employment opportunities and better conditions of work in countries of emigration so as to reduce the need to migrate to find employment, and to ensure that international migration takes place under conditions designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment,

Considering that with increasing economic integration and the movement of workers between countries, countries should consider questions relating to migrant workers and may need to cooperate more effectively in tackling any problems,

Concerned that migration can embody practices which are not in keeping with the principles embodied in relevant ILO standards and considering that there is need to ensure that the conditions of recruitment and employment of migrant workers are in line with those principles,

Expressing concern about acts of racism and xenophobia and the discrimination in employment to which migrant workers may sometimes be exposed,

Calling for effective means to eliminate illegal migration for employment, including through effective measures against labour-recruiting agents, intermediaries and employers of illegal migrant workers,

Convinced that the ILO has an important and valuable role to play in international efforts, including those of the United Nations system, concerning the welfare and the fundamental rights of all migrant workers and their families,

Stressing the need for employers' and workers' organisations to be associated, wherever relevant, in the work of all national, regional and international bodies concerned with questions affecting migrant workers and members of their families;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to take all appropriate measures to ensure that the terms and conditions of employment of migrant workers respect the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination, and the provisions of the relevant ILO instruments;

(b) to consider ratification of relevant ILO Conventions concerning the rights of migrant workers and their families;

(c) to take appropriate national measures and to cooperate effectively in the field of international assistance, designed to eradicate migrationary pressures;

(d) to take duly into account all pertinent national and international standards when concluding bilateral agreements on migration;

(e) to take appropriate action which may include legislation to combat all acts of racism and xenophobia against migrant workers, and to intensify information and educational activities to this end;

(f) to ensure that migrant workers have access to information on their rights, including, where necessary, in their own languages;

(g) to involve, through appropriate means, workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and monitoring of the effects of policies which cover recruitment, employment and the working conditions of migrant workers;

2. Requests the Governing Body of the Intenational Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make the necessary provisions in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium for activities which appropriately address the need for the protection and promotion of migrant workers' rights;

(b) to present to an early session of the Governing Body a report on the conditions of migrant workers, to make proposals regarding any appropriate action to be taken when these are not in conformity with the principles embodied in relevant ILO instruments and to keep the Governing Body informed at regular intervals on matters pertaining to these issues;

(c) to continue and, where appropriate, intensify ILO cooperation with other international institutions concerned, including the International Organisation for Migration (IOM), on policies affecting migrant workers, including social and economic policies and employment creation in all countries and to consider appropriate measures to provide the necessary tripartite guidance for the ILO input in this area;

(d) to provide adequate advisory services, monitoring and technical cooperation on migration issues, with the aim of helping governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to formulate and apply effectively policies to protect the rights of migrant workers and to promote their welfare;

(e) to promote the dissemination of information on the rights of migrant workers and members of their families that are recognised in the relevant international instruments, and specifically on their right to freedom of association;

(f) to cooperate closely with the United Nations Compensation Commission so as to ensure that the work already undertaken by the ILO to register migrant workers displaced by the Gulf conflict of 1990-91 is put to use in ensuring that proper compensation reaches the largest possible number of those with just entitlements and to draw conclusions from this experience for situations which may arise in the future;

(g) to continue to examine relevant migration issues and problems, and ways of tackling them, in all the appropriate fora of the ILO.

The composition of the Committee was subsequently modified 11 times and the number of votes allotted accordingly.[1]

2. The Committee elected the following officers:

4. The Committee held 13 sittings.

5. The Committee had before it Report VI, prepared by the Office, on the sixth item on the agenda of the Conference, "Adjustment and human resources development".

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General introduced the report on "Adjustment and human resources development", noting the ILO's long-standing concern for the development of vocational skills for freely-chosen and productive employment. The importance that the ILO places on human resources development in general and vocational training issues in particular was reflected in the Conventions and Recommendations on the subject[1], and supported by references in the Preamble of the Organisation's Constitution and the Philadelphia Declaration.

7. He noted the vital role of training in facilitating structural change and adjustment, by enhancing economic performance and increasing the ability of individuals to adapt to change, safeguard their employment and improve the quality of their working conditions. The report reflected two broad areas of concern: how training could be made to promote structural adjustment and long-term economic growth, and how to protect workers and ensure social equity in the process. Underlying both themes was the crucial role of the social partners in ensuring desirable social and economic outcomes.

8. He then explained that structural adjustment was defined broadly in the report to include factors such as changes in technology, consumer preference and work organisation, often omitted in narrower definitions emphasising macro-economic solutions to structural imbalances.

9. The report attempted to respond to the concerns expressed by the Governing Body in selecting this topic for general discussion at the 79th International Labour Conference. These included the important role of tripartism in developing training policies, the impact of reductions in social expenditures on the more vulnerable groups of the population, and the protection of working conditions, especially for informal sector workers. Emphasis was also placed on the contribution of training and retraining in the transition economies. The Governing Body had expressed the hope that the general discussion would contribute significantly to the development of an ILO Human Resources Development Policy. The report also continued the deliberations on a number of significant topics initiated in the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and the subsequent symposia organised in the regions, as well as in meetings of the Employment Committee.

10. The representative of the Secretary-General then explained the organisation of the report which comprises two parts. The first summarised the effects of adjustment on training systems and on particular groups, while the second provided details of responses by governments, firms and institutions. He noted that much less attention had been given to the role of the social partners in formulating and implementing responsive training policies, and indicated his hope that this topic would be developed further in the discussions. In addition, more detailed accounts by the Committee members of specific national approaches to training would be a valuable addition.

11. He then suggested seven areas which could guide the discussion. First, in the context of adjustment, there was a need to identify how training could be made responsive to rapidly changing labour markets. Second, measures were required to ensure the limited resources available for training were used effectively. Third, issues of equity and the needs of the most vulnerable groups should be safeguarded as opportunities for training arose. Fourth, while acknowledging the important role of training in raising productivity, the potential of training to enhance workers' individual capacities and opportunities should also be maximised. Fifth, both the willingness and ability of employers to provide training and the motivation of workers to undertake training should be enhanced. Sixth, particular attention should be paid to the integration of tripartism into the processes of training policy formulation and implementation. Finally, the Committee could recommend priorities for the ILO in assisting member States to establish efficient and equitable training systems.

General discussion

12. The Employers' Vice-Chairman commended the Office on preparing a concise text which encapsulated the essential issues related to the impact of structural adjustment on human resources development. While appreciating the points for discussion raised by the representative of the Secretary-General, the Employers' group hoped that the discussion would not be restricted to these points.

13. He then indicated several issues of central concern to the Employers' group. In assessing the impact of structural adjustment processes on education and training, he stressed the importance of distinguishing between specific national, regional and global contexts. While considerable differences could be found between countries and regions, certain global trends provided a basis for joint international action. The Employers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the efforts of the Office to focus attention on the provision of training and retraining of displaced workers, rather than on only providing compensation. They also appreciated the shift in emphasis from training for declining industries and sectors to the provision of skills for entrepreneurship development and self-employment. In view of increased privatisation, management training should also be given greater emphasis especially in developing countries. The Employers' group was of the opinion that, until recently, education had focused more on literacy than on preparing youth for the labour market. Finally, the Vice-Chairman pointed out that the financing of basic education was the social responsibility of governments, which should regard education and training as a strategic investment. However, he noted that employers were willing to share some of the costs as long as it was within their means, the training was considered relevant and they were involved in establishing the objectives and designing the programmes.

14. He next elaborated on the nature of structural adjustment and its impact on education and training in different contexts: industrialised and newly industrialised countries, countries moving from centralised to pre-market economies such as in Eastern and Central Europe, and developing countries saddled with heavy external debts. Analyses of the effect of adjustment should also distinguish between different groups of workers, such as youth, women, older workers and the disabled persons. He noted that while policy initiatives might have certain commonalities, there would also be major divergencies. For example, regarding the first category of countries, he noted that adjustment occurred largely in the context of accommodating technological change and shifts in the international division of labour following the replacement of traditional industries and the expansion of the service sector. The central concern in training would be to ensure flexibility and responsiveness to the new and rapidly changing demands for skills. The changes entailed in Central and Eastern European countries however, as they moved from centrally planned to market-oriented economies, had resulted in the closing of many state enterprises and the resultant laying-off of workers as attempts were made to rationalise production and improve productivity. Combined with a critical shortage of funds, training in this context would be geared primarily to adapting to new conditions, moving away from those industrial and agricultural trades which were in decline and transforming training systems to cater to the growing service sector. In addition, training policies and systems should provide skills for entrepreneurship development, self-employment and increased managerial capability. Developing countries, he noted, unlike the other two categories, were confronted by a lack of basic skills and technological know-how. These deficiencies had been exacerbated by structural adjustment programmes and globalisation processes that had opened up countries to increased international competition, liberalised trade, reduced subsidies, resulting in increased informalisation as well as reduced investments in the education and training sectors.

15. The Employers' Vice-Chairman drew the Committee's attention to the Declaration of the 14th Annual Meeting of representatives of the African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP)/EEC, which emphasised the impact on public expenditure in education of the financial crisis of the 1980s in developing countries. Due to the contraction of public administration as a result of adjustment programmes, there was now a large sector of the population unprepared for alternative employment. Training should be directed towards promoting entrepreneurship and enterprise development and enterprise-based training schemes geared to training in excess of specific enterprise needs in order to create a reserve of skills. In addition, relevant training for the informal sector should be provided with the aim of improving efficiency and facilitating linkages to formal sector activities. Training and education must also respond to workers' needs to cope with technological and structural change, by ensuring computer literacy, developing competencies in the use of new technologies, modernising science and technical education to build a new "technological culture" and providing training aimed at creativity and flexibility. In this context, he noted the need to use regional and international training facilities such as the ILO International Training Centre in Turin. In closing, the Employers' Vice-Chairman pledged the readiness of the Employers' group to cooperate with the Workers' group in ensuring that the Committee's work would be constructive and beneficial.

16. The Workers' Vice-Chairman associated himself with the previous speaker in congratulating the Office on preparing a positive and future-oriented report, and confirmed the full cooperation of the Workers' group in seeking solutions. He opened his statement by emphasising the importance of moving beyond ideological statements about the dignity of humankind, the rights of labour, and the need for interaction of the social partners for the continuous expansion of democratic practice, to practical programmes and outcomes. He emphasised four points made in the 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment as additional guidance for the deliberations of the Committee: protection of the poorest, especially women; full respect for ILO standards; tripartite consultation and cooperation; and the promotion of collective bargaining. In this context, the Workers' group disagreed with the tendency to consider structural adjustment and development apart from the issue of international solidarity and the provision of concrete economic and technical support in the field of human resources development by the industrialised countries to developing countries. Without such support the "new world order" would hold little promise for many millions of workers. The success of structural adjustment programmes was directly linked to the extent to which the social dimension of change was an object of concern. In this context, the value of achieving social consensus could not be underrated and should be a major aspect of the Committee's conclusions.

17. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the situation in developing countries required special mention, in that they had little choice on the structural adjustment policies and programmes to be implemented. They had often been introduced as a package, with little regard for the social repercussions and the economic impact on the poor and vulnerable groups. Structural adjustment programmes implemented under these circumstances should be re-evaluated, in particular in terms of the pace at which they were being implemented and the distribution of costs and benefits, with a view to maintaining basic social standards and preventing greater inequities. The ILO should take a lead role in recommending such action.

18. He then outlined several points of central concern to the Workers' group. He emphasised the need for training to be certifiable and to ensure common recognition of qualifications. This would facilitate the matching of demand and supply of skills. He noted the right of workers to continuing education and training, as well as the importance of basic literacy and numeracy education in developing countries. In this context, as an incentive to undertake training, workers should be paid while being trained. He also pointed out that strategies which aimed at upgrading of skills and personal development often functioned to break down hierarchical working relations that prevented groups such as women, migrants and young workers from assuming more responsible positions.

19. He stressed that primary responsibility for economic growth resides with governments. Since future economic prosperity was inextricably linked with investments in education and training, governments should ensure that the short and long-term needs of the economy were fully met. Training and education should figure as a critical element in a government's active labour market policy. He drew the attention of the Committee to a recent meeting of the OECD Council of Ministers (18-19 May 1992) which stressed the complementarity between active labour market and human resources development policies.

20. The Workers' group was concerned with the use of adjustment programmes to reduce wages, casualise labour, de-unionise, and drive parts of the formal sector back into the informal. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed the need to acknowledge the reality of the informal sector as being in transition to formal status and to bring its components back into the formal sector rather than accepting its continued existence and expansion. In this context, he drew attention to the conclusions of the Committee of Employment, in particular paragraph 65 of the November 1991 report to the Governing Body. The ILO had a critical role to play in supporting and promoting "practical solidarity" in carrying out training and education programmes. To this end, the Organisation should promote a greater role for the social partners in consultations between governments and the IMF/World Bank on the design and introduction of structural adjustment programmes. He emphasised the central role of the promotion of standards in ILO activities, and suggested that technical assistance should not be extended where workers' rights were violated.

21. In conclusion, he mentioned a point in the report (page 20) with which the Workers' group disagreed, concerning the " power " of employers in determining skill requirements. The Workers thought that employers should be able to influence the range and specificity of training; however, in view of their tendency to take short-term perspectives, they should not have sole responsibility. Governments, with the social partners, must establish priorities and policies for training and education which provided long-term benefits to the population and the economy.

22. In the general discussion of the report several members emphasised the importance of considering the impact of structural adjustment on human resources development within a national economic, social and education context. Some members distinguished between different types of structural adjustment. The Government member of the United States pointed out that it was important to differentiate between the effects of adjustment and the economic factors that made it necessary, as well as between adjustment processes aimed at redressing macroeconomic imbalances (stabilisation) and those involving policy and institutional reforms to promote rapid growth. The representative of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) emphasised that structural adjustment could be either " voluntary " or " imposed ". Adjustments in industrialised and newly industrialising countries fell in the first category. In contrast, indebted developing countries, especially in Africa, were subject to structural adjustment measures imposed on them by the IMF and the World Bank. In his view the provisions set out in the latter case had violated human and trade union rights, increased hardship and poverty, and resulted in the disintegration of the African middle class. The Employers' member of Algeria felt that the report gave insufficient weight to the influence of the world economy, a view supported by the Government members of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Nicaragua, who described situations in their countries where external interventions and internal factors such as civil war had necessitated very specific responses and treatment. In particular, the Government member of Nicaragua insisted that adjustment could not be confined to vocational training and stressed the paramount importance, in his view, of putting order into the world economy and reducing the protectionism of the developed countries. The Employers' member of Australia observed that structural adjustment was generally considered at the macro-level; however, micro-level reforms were also required to cope with the impact of change.

23. Both positive and negative aspects of structural adjustment were identified. Several members of all three groups called attention to the negative factors. The Government member of Turkey noted the widening gap between the " haves " and the " have nots ", and increased levels of poverty. In the view of the Workers' member of Guatemala, structural adjustment programmes often violated ethical, cultural and human rights, produced a deterioration of living standards and undermined democratic processes, in particular trade union activity. The Employers' members of Guyana and India and the Government members of Fiji, Nicaragua, Zimbabwe and the Syrian Arab Republic noted with concern that budget cuts and wage freezes had led to a brain-drain from their countries, representing a significant wastage of scarce resources invested in education and training.

Other members emphasised some positive aspects of structural adjustment. The Employers' member of Algeria noted that the structural adjustment processes per se were not necessarily negative; however, the situation of economic crisis in which such reforms took place generally compromised the ability of countries to carry them out in coordinated and effective ways. The Employers' member of Germany emphasised that only a functioning economy could make the " right to education " a reality. Structural adjustment measures increased public resources and provided the means for high quality education and training in both developing and industrialised countries. The Employers' member of New Zealand added that the deregulation of markets as part of structural adjustment programmes could function to stimulate the provision of training and education by removing legislative rigidities and barriers such as non-wage labour costs. The Government member of the United States felt that while the report was well done, it placed too much emphasis on the negative social impact of adjustment and referred to recent work of the OECD that indicated certain positive trends in social indicators. He sought more information on ILO's work on policies to minimise negative social consequences, especially as regards the informal sector.

24. Employers' members of Japan and Mauritius and the Government members of Malaysia and Fiji described the contribution of education and training, in particular the value of long-term planning and investment, to economic growth and development in their countries. The Employers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic drew attention to the newly industrialised countries in South-East Asia as examples of countries which had overcome a lack of natural resources through the development of their human resources. A number of members from all three groups noted with concern the negative effect on training and education of specific adjustment measures such as budget cuts and devaluation. The Government member of Germany suggested that the report's portrayal of the influence of budget restrictions might be overly generalised. The Employers' member of Australia pointed out that successful training relied on the quality of basic education and its relevance to employment needs; however, the insufficient or irregular flow of financial resources had brought about a situation whereby the opportunities for education and training of the most vulnerable groups and the poor had been reduced. The Employers' member of Kenya suggested that education and training policies and programmes under circumstances of adjustment must be planned in response to the needs of specific groups, in particular the most vulnerable such as women, disabled persons, older workers and migrants. The Government member of China emphasised the importance of meeting the needs of rural workers. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stressed that human resources development policies should be formulated giving priority to reducing poverty and unemployment and improving the living and working conditions of the most vulnerable groups of workers.

25. The financing of education and training was a concern shared by members of all three groups. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that while responsibility resided primarily with governments especially for basic education, employers were willing to share the cost of training their employees. He added that governments should provide an environment favourable to learning, emphasising life-long learning, adaptation to change and self-help. Employers should be responsible for the training and retraining of their employees. The Workers' group differed in opinion and suggested that since employers tended to take a short-term perspective on training, decisions concerning investments in education and training should remain the overall responsibility of governments but taken in consultation with the social partners. In response, the Employers' member of the United Kingdom agreed that some employers, as well as some governments, often took a short-term view of investment in training, but others realised the need to be forward-looking if they were to survive. He cited the case of his own country, which had experienced considerable under-investment and lack of coordination in the past. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported the view that when confronted with scarce resources, cost-sharing between governments and the private sector was a possible solution. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom added that their experience with training levies, as one kind of cost-sharing arrangement, had not been positive. Rather than encouraging employers to invest in training systematically, he pointed out that levy systems had created excessive bureaucracy and therefore had had somewhat the opposite effect. The Employers' member of Germany shared this view explaining that neither employers nor workers in his country favoured a training levy. Other members, however, including the Government members of Zimbabwe and Fiji and the Employers' member of Mauritius, cited examples of levy systems, primarily in developing country contexts, which had been successful in terms of stimulating awareness and investment in training among employers.

Cost-effectiveness in training was also raised as an area of special concern. In view of the scarce resources available for vocational training, several Government and Employers' members stressed the need to set priorities carefully and focus on high quality training outputs. The Employers' member of India pointed out that quality of training was not necessarily linked to resource levels and cited examples of low-cost methods which were highly effective in reaching large numbers of people.

26. Members from all three groups recognised the relationship between education and training on the one hand, and building more democratic values, institutions and processes, in which citizens assumed a greater role on the other. The Government member of Portugal stressed the need for adjustment processes to be managed by people rather than the reverse. He regretted what he interpreted as a premise of the report that workers should be adjusted to the needs of the economy and that education and training should be the instruments to bring about this situation. The Government member of Namibia saw vocational education and training as a means of promoting the productivity of labour, eliminating inequalities in society and maintaining social justice and democracy. He suggested that the Committee recommend assisting workers' and employers' organisations to contribute more meaningfully to the provision of vocational training. The Government member of Poland observed that the democratisation of the political and socio-economic system in his country had been accompanied by major changes in the objectives and content of the education and training system. In this context, the Workers' member of Guatemala raised the question of the kind of society one is trying to build and the role of training and education in this process. Members from all groups recognised the need for concerted efforts by governments and the social partners to create the conditions under which democratic processes would prevail. The Employers' member of Switzerland pointed out the role of training and intellectual development in preparing citizens to press for respect for human rights and democratic processes. Several members emphasised the significance of an "enterprise culture" as an "antidote against bureaucracy" and as a means of stimulating economic activity, creativity, motivation, and greater worker-employer consultation in the workplace. The Employers' member of Australia and the Government members of Portugal, Zambia and Australia suggested that the perspective on training and education in the report be broadened to take a more comprehensive view of capacity building in the sense of creating the motivation among workers and employers to identify new work structures, organisation and practices which would lead to greater worker participation, employment opportunities and self development. The Employers' member of Zambia suggested that greater inter-agency collaboration, especially between the ILO and UNESCO, could promote a more comprehensive view of education and training.

27. Government and Employers' members of the United Kingdom and the United States suggested ways in which education and training could facilitate adjustment while responding to the needs of workers and the economy, mainly by devolving responsibility and decision-making to local and community levels to ensure responsiveness to local problems and greater equality of access to education and training. The Government member of Uganda noted that the implementation of structural adjustment measures had brought hardship to the population but action at the grassroots level, in particular the decentralisation of training to the district level, had helped to alleviate some of the problems. Several Employers' and Government members provided country experiences demonstrating how training and education had facilitated change as a result of adjustment and become more responsive to the needs of students, workers and the market. The Government member of Australia described the ongoing reform of the education and training system in his country, which involved consultation at all levels of government, with the social partners, and in the community. Financial support was given for specific sectoral and community level training. A training levy was established to ensure a more equitable distribution of training costs, which resulted in many enterprises identifying for the first time their level of investment in training. The development of curricular and competency standards were conducted at national level but also reflected a high degree of local level involvement to respond to local needs. The Government member of Senegal observed that the move towards a more open and efficient economy had required his government to formulate a new training policy placing priority on equality of opportunity, greater access to training for vulnerable groups and adaptation of training to market needs. Meeting these policy objectives required increased resource allocations and the orientation of training programme content and delivery mechanisms. The Employers' member of Germany explained the dual system practised in Germany, Austria and Switzerland, which involved a significant commitment by employers and resulted in training according to the needs of employers and the market, as only one-third takes place in schools but two-thirds in company training institutions. The result was a youth unemployment rate lower than the overall rate of unemployment in Germany, and a much lower rate of youth unemployment than in countries which took a more academic approach. The Government member of Malaysia stated that the structural reforms adopted in his country had been accompanied by reforms in the education and training systems. Decision-making was decentralised and some training shifted to the enterprise level which was further facilitated by the introduction of a levy system to support training and upgrading of workers' skills as a complement. In comparison, the Employers' member of Mauritius observed that human resources development should have been part of the structural adjustment programme put in place in 1979 in his country, but had been neglected until much later, by which time enterprises were suffering from deficits in skilled labour. He recommended that the integration of an explicit training policy in structural adjustment programmes would provide a framework in which employers could operate and would ultimately speed up economic recovery. The Government member of Poland noted that, as a result of labour market restructuring and the resulting unemployment and changes in demand, vocational training had become an essential aspect of the structural adjustment programme. As training objectives and content changed, so had the institutional structure through which training was planned and delivered. Responsibility was devolved to the local level and a major role in training had been assumed by new partners, in particular, local non-governmental training institutions, as well as employers' and workers' organisations. Tripartite employment councils were established at the local level to coordinate labour market policy. The Government member of Czechoslovakia noted similar issues in his country. The training system was decentralised although responsibility for formulating training policy and setting certification and performance standards was maintained at national level. Closer linkages between the education and training sector and labour market services were required as well as an appropriate labour market and training information system. Private training institutions should be stimulated and a greater role for employers identified. Finally the training and education systems which operated in isolation of each other should be coordinated. He also disagreed with the report's analysis that training resources should be redirected, since the real need was a major increase in the total level of funding. The Employers' member of Venezuela presented the main features of the vocational training system in his country as cooperative, tripartite in character, and financed by both companies and workers. This system had produced substantial effects as regards the intake of a great number of people into the labour market. However, he felt that structural adjustment, by raising training costs, had reduced the impact of this system. The Government member of Cyprus, noting the severe economic problems since 1974, explained that training was provided by the Government, private agencies and employers through an Industrial Training Authority, which was under tripartite governance. The Authority had strengthened enterprises through the provision of training subsidies to employers and allowances to trainees, financed by a levy on employers' payrolls. He felt that the cornerstones for any training system included meeting the requirements of the economy, creating awareness among employers of the need to train, and motivating workers to increase their knowledge and skills. Tripartite cooperation must be encouraged in the design, implementation and evaluation of training systems.

28. A number of speakers noted with satisfaction the support of the ILO in such areas as: the provision of training programmes including those of the ILO International Training Centre in Turin, reinforcement of the role of the social partners and small enterprise and management development. Other members indicated a need for ILO assistance in promoting the exchange of experiences in training between countries; developing information systems linking training institutions, social partners and policy makers; training in management and small enterprise development; and vocational training for vulnerable groups, including the development of low cost training methods. The Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that the promotion of standards should play a central role in ILO activities and that no economic exigency could ever justify the violation of labour standards. He suggested that ILO technical assistance should be withheld in cases of violation of human rights. Other members advised caution on this issue and felt that careful reflection was required before taking such a position. One member pointed out that such a policy might have negative repercussions for vulnerable groups. Numerous members of all groups saw the need for the ILO to monitor more closely the impact of structural adjustment. In particular, the Workers' member of Ghana called on the ILO to renew its leading role among the United Nations agencies in promoting greater tripartite participation in setting national priorities and implementing structural adjustment policies and programmes.

EFFECTS OF STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENT ON TRAINING

29. The Workers' Vice-Chairman began the discussion by drawing the attention of the Committee to Chapter 1 of the report, which examined how education and training had been affected by structural adjustment. The Workers' group noted that this section focused on the situation in developing countries, while adjustment policies had been implemented throughout the world. In many countries, spending on education and training had fallen as a result of a deliberate policy of reductions in taxes and public sector spending in the belief that the "invisible hand" of the free market would stimulate economic recovery. The Workers' group believed that reliance on the market alone was inadequate.

The Workers' group stressed that education and training were the key to long-term economic viability and social stability. Therefore, spending on education should not be treated as an "optional extra" that could be expanded and contracted according to the dictates of the market. Observing that the IMF and the World Bank had belatedly recognised the importance of expenditures on education, the Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that this new emphasis on maintaining spending levels on education was especially welcomed. Nevertheless, it had not yet had an impact on many developing countries which were still under immense pressure to cut education spending in the course of implementing adjustment programmes. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested that where necessary, structural adjustment should be carried out at a slower pace, in order to maintain basic expenditures on education. He also called for additional resources from industrialised countries and consideration of reducing or cancelling the debt of developing countries.

Referring to the speech by the IMF Managing Director to the United Nations Economic and Social Council in July 1990, the Workers' group supported the proposal to consider increasing taxes on wealthier citizens on the grounds of equity and impact on the economy: equity because it was justifiable that the most able should assume a greater share of the costs of adjustment, and economically because government spending would have an expansionary effect on the economy. The Workers' group also supported the call for governments to cut military expenditures noting that in some countries such expenditures accounted for a much greater share of the national budget than education or health. The distribution of resources within the education and training sector should not be modified during structural adjustment. Governments should establish clear goals and training policies, through a process of tripartite consultation, taking into account short and longer-term skill needs of the economy and providing for equity in education and training, in particular for women and girls. In closing, he re-emphasised the priority attached by the Workers' group to education and training, which were essential for long-term growth and development of the economy.

30. The acting Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group noted the importance of recognising investment in education as being limited to those expenditures which have a return in the market. This is especially important because education and training expenditures can become a bottomless sink if not properly targeted. He also pointed out the desirability of moving beyond analyses of the effects of adjustment, in particular stabilisation policies, and focusing on specific responses to adjustment. In this context, he noted that enterprises had turned to education and training as a way of staying competitive, meeting consumer demands and maintaining employment levels. Another major response had been an increased appreciation of the need for entrepreneurial and managerial expertise to create enterprises which would provide new employment opportunities for displaced workers and the growing number of entrants to the labour market. In addition, reductions in budgets and demographic factors including migration had squeezed education and training budgets. In some countries, this had led to the emergence of pressure groups to maintain or increase public expenditures in training. It had also encouraged novel approaches to pooling resources and forming partnerships to increase the efficiency of training institutions. He noted that the new mix of skills and competencies required by the labour markets of today and tomorrow focused attention on the urgent need to restructure and reorient general educational institutions, curricula and teacher training. Changes had taken place at all levels of vocational training and education and in the emphasis placed on entrepreneurship and management skills.

He then identified a number of actors and responses to structural adjustment and solicited additional examples from the Committee. For instance, cooperative efforts between governments, public training institutions, workers' and employers' organisations, community groups and individuals included: private sector inputs into school curricula; business-education partnerships; business-labour education and training programmes; community training institutions; targeted programmes for disadvantaged groups; and efforts to establish minimum standards, core skills and competencies for general education. Private education and training institutions had also responded to adjustment with package programmes for business creation and support; renting unused public institutions; developing correspondence, open and distance learning and multi-media programmes; and providing management training and entrepreneurship development. Initiatives by employers and their organisations included multi-skilling; training of suppliers and customers; courses for members of employers' organisations; and "employee empowerment" programmes. The efforts of workers and their organisations had in some cases improved apprenticeship programmes; provided job-related training after hours and workers' education programmes; and had increased workers' ability to transfer between trades.

31. The interventions of other Committee members emphasised the critical importance of education and training in situations of adjustment. However, while the demand for increased provision of training was clear, so were the problems confronting governments in implementing responsive and effective programmes. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania described the destabilising effect of adjustment and noted that the development and utilisation of human resources in his country were contingent on major investments in technology, management capability, resources and time, all of which were unavailable under existing IMF conditions. The Workers' member of India explained how reduced expenditures, devaluation and privatisation had led to unprecedented numbers of unemployed and a shift to the informal sector. The existing training infrastructure, with institutions closing and teachers' salaries falling due to budget cuts, was unable to cope. He also noted, as did the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, the brain-drain from his country to others offering better employment conditions. This represented a major loss in training investment. The Government member of United Republic of Tanzania and the Employers' member of Ethiopia indicated the magnitude of the problem facing their countries which were undergoing a transition to a market economy. Unprecedented levels of unemployed school-leavers, retrenched civil servants and ex-military personnel posed problems in terms of training and employment creation but also a major threat to democratisation and peace processes. In Africa, adjustment had clearly brought about a shock to national economies resulting in "chaos" as one member put it. Governments could not wait for the eventual results of training and retraining but needed short-term solutions to alleviate a crisis situation.

32. The Employers' member of China pointed out that structural adjustment was not a one-way process. Major reforms were also required to make the education system, in particular, responsive to needs of the economy and society. Greater attention should be paid to rural producers. Several other members noted that training was not meeting the requirements of informal sector workers. Developing countries, according to the Employers' member of India, could not afford conventional ways of training which were not only costly, but applied individual rather than mass learning approaches and were institution or enterprise based. These factors limited the capacity to reach the informal sector. Other members cited the lack of trainers and teachers and the inadequate resources for entrepreneurship and enterprise development. While education and training systems clearly required closer linkages between supply and demand, some members also voiced caution as regards the exclusive reliance on the "profit motive" implicit in a market orientation. The Government member of the Netherlands stressed that reliance on the provision of vocational and technical skills would not fulfill the skill requirements of the future. Motivation, flexibility, creativity and changes in attitude were also needed. The Workers' Vice-Chairman added that if training was geared only to the needs of the market, there would be fewer students in subjects such as music, art and literature, areas having less direct economic benefit perhaps but crucial for the development of national culture and society.

A few members noted lessons to be derived from training experiences in their countries. The Workers' member of the United States referred to the de-skilling of the work force and the negative impact on incentives to provide and to undertake training. In this context, he suggested that worker participation and training were more effective when carried out in a union context. The Government member of the United States stressed the central role of education and training in restructuring, suggesting an expanded concept of vocational training to include "citizen education" and an enhanced recognition of market dynamics. Increased knowledge of the institutional arrangements under market economies, for example education in the rule of law and property rights, would be especially important to transition economies. The clear linkage between productivity and investment in education and training in his country was recently confirmed by the findings of a national survey of business managers. The quality of education was singled out as the most significant social issue affecting their organisations. This view, he explained, was also reflected in a recent OECD Ministerial Communiqué which endorsed efforts to improve the efficiency of labour markets, including actions to strengthen and modernise education and training systems.

NATIONAL TRAINING POLICIES IN SUPPORT OF STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENT

33. The Employers' Vice-Chairman identified several major features of a national training policy to support adjustment: strategic priorities should be set by governments in consultation with the social partners; objectives should be geared to the market and should adjust according to demand; and incentives should be provided to workers, employers and training institutions. He then suggested that tax rebates for training costs and reimbursements from training levy schemes could be used, as appropriate, to motivate employers to provide training. Incentives for workers might include employee empowerment schemes, increased pay for increased levels of skill, and multi-skilling to increase worker flexibility and adaptability. For displaced workers, entrepreneurship development programmes could facilitate business start-up. Management training including leadership skills could contribute to career development and mobility. For fee-charging training institutions to survive budget cuts, they should be permitted to retain their fees and encouraged to gear training to flexible client-oriented programmes.

In the view of the Employers' group, it was the role of governments to provide general education to a basic standard and to provide training for displaced workers. Employers had primary responsibility for training and retraining their employees, including the provision of literacy and numeracy, where needed, to increase worker adaptability. Employers' organisations should provide their members with courses to train trainers and develop entrepreneurial and supervisory skills. They could also raise awareness among employers and the general public of the benefits of training their work force, as well as mobilise international assistance in support of training. Both employers' and workers' organisations should be encouraged to set up training institutions to supplement government efforts.

Governments should promote efforts of the private sector and community self-help initiatives to provide training. Facilities could be shared among contiguous institutions and audio-visual methods and mass media could be used to counterbalance the shortage of teachers. In closing, the Employers' Vice-Chairman re-emphasised the need to place training at the centre of structural adjustment reforms instead of leaving it as a "residual beneficiary or victim as the case may be".

34. Noting the imposition of structural adjustment programmes on many countries, the Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group could support only those forms of adjustment which were capable of achieving workers' goals. Restricting the discussion to national training policies did not adequately reflect other aspects of human resources development which were fundamental to democracy and to the sustainability of development programmes. In particular, he noted the vital role of processes of consultation and decentralisation. Consultation should begin at the enterprise level and extend to the national level. Improving employer-employee relationships contributed to higher productivity and better human resources development and utilisation. He reaffirmed that the social partners needed to be involved and to agree on the parameters of national policy in both specific areas, such as education and training, and on broader questions of structural adjustment. If there was no collective ownership of the problem, there could be no collective ownership of the solution.

He noted that while substantial areas of agreement had emerged between the Workers' and Employers' groups, the Workers' group did not accept that the market was able to determine complex questions regarding long-term education and training needs of society in a satisfactory manner. Competent national authorities should determine these needs through democratic processes which would most likely entail decentralisation and coordination at local and, where appropriate, sectoral levels. Governments should avoid short-term solutions, such as reducing the length of courses and encouraging shifts from humanistic to technological education, which superficially responded to market needs but in the long run jeopardised diversity and creativity.

He then indicated that the financing of training should be through a mix of public and private resources. His group supported a system of applied education and training as found in the German dual system, which would provide workers with the ability to adapt to the rapid changes occurring in the workplace. He noted that a training levy on enterprises might contribute to the fair distribution of training costs. It could be reduced for enterprises providing high-quality in-house training and in cases where training was of a particularly high quality appropriate incentives could be envisaged. However, many enterprises were not in a position to provide training, for example, micro-enterprises. He suggested that a training levy to pay for public training facilities appeared to provide the best solution. Facilities such as paid educational leave should be provided to enable workers to pursue their interests including in subject areas which might have limited direct vocational application. He emphasised that multinational enterprises should pay special attention to the provision of training in developing countries to provide a transfer of technology and skills. He drew particular attention to the need for education and training to increase productivity in the rural sector of developing countries. Turning to the question of skills certification, the Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that there would be an increasing need for standardisation and accreditation of qualifications by independent authorities at the national as well as the international levels. This might best be undertaken on a tripartite basis in each sector of the economy. On the basis that free universal education and training was a basic human right, the Workers' group opposed the cost-recovery measures favoured by the World Bank, which required students to pay for their own education. The Workers' group also objected to structural adjustment measures which involved a reduction in expenditure on education. Governments should make education a major priority since successful training depended upon a sound education. In this context, the Workers' Vice-Chairman also stressed that only the public sector could ensure training for the unemployed and equal access to training for groups such as women or youth.

35. Concerning the major features of a training policy and framework, Employers' (Canada, Germany, Mauritius, Australia, United Kingdom), Workers' (Cyprus, United Kingdom) and Government members (Germany, Japan, Malaysia) described for training policy development and implementation in their countries. Several members described the tripartite basis and the active cooperation which existed between the social partners at national, local and institutional levels. Several members further identified tripartite consultations as a key element in successful national education and training policy development which had contributed to the creation of effective training systems. The Government member of the United Kingdom stressed the potential benefits of establishing Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs) in which employers and local education authorities are represented to enable public funds to be focused more effectively on meeting the needs of employers and local level markets. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom however reported a conflicting view which indicated the extent to which government impeded the work of these local authorities, due to such things as vacillation in setting targets and insufficient financial support. He argued for greater tripartite involvement to prevent "wasteful" decisions which reflected political "tinkering" rather than a concern for meeting local level needs. The Government member of Japan and the Employers' member of Canada noted that regional considerations were an important feature of national training policy in their countries. Regions were encouraged to plan their own training programmes in order to respond to the diversity of regional training needs. The Government member of Cyprus pointed out that the ability of national training systems to support or facilitate structural adjustment depended on its training needs assessment and planning. He described the procedures followed under the aegis of a tripartite training authority in his country and stressed that overall effectiveness was due to the close ties between training and enterprise authorities. The Government member of the United States attributed the ability to adjust to several factors including: early intervention and rapid delivery of programmes; emphasis on early return to work rather than income maintenance measures; broad-based eligibility; full range of services to meet the needs of a spectrum of dislocated workers; and most importantly, worker involvement especially at the planning stage. With regard to the context of training, the Employers' members of Mauritius and the United Kingdom emphasised the need for "political will" on the part of governments to make training policy and investments in training an integral element of long-term strategic planning and national economic policy. In Mauritius, the Government had adopted a policy and special budget for training, as part of its economic programme, in order to facilitate the transition from a labour- to a capital-intensive economy. The Employers' member of Australia noted that his Government had identified training system reform as fundamental to economic development. This decision led to the creation of a tripartite National Board of Education and Training with responsibility for coordinating training in the country.

36. Many Government (Algeria, Japan, Malaysia, United States), Employers' (Australia, Canada, Germany, Mauritius) and Workers' (Cyprus) members described examples of incentive schemes to stimulate employers and training institutions to provide training. In Canada, industrial sector training objectives and programmes were planned and prioritised according to the needs of the industry and financed by government from contributions from employers (2/3) and employees (1/3) through an unemployment insurance fund. In Australia, training levy funds were retained at enterprise level, in conformity with legislative provisions, to facilitate training to meet the needs of the enterprise. Two enterprise level programmes, "workplace reform" and "best practice", provided funding for innovative projects and for the adoption of best international practice, respectively, to help create a climate for improved enterprise performance. In Cyprus, the Industrial Training Authority levy on payrolls financed partly or wholly the cost of special training needs of industry as determined by bipartite (employers, workers) technical committees for each sector of the economy. In Japan, the Government provided subsidies for the establishment of training programmes within enterprises.

37. The Government member of Germany described incentives which had proven effective in encouraging workers, including women re-entering the labour force after a break, to engage in training, retraining and further training. These include better employment opportunities for those already employed and, for those seeking employment, payments for participation in training which was greater than unemployment benefits. The Government member of the United Kingdom explained that young people obtained training credits which permitted them to choose among skill training programmes. Established employees could obtain career development loans to undergo more expensive training. The Government member of Japan noted that paid leave for employees, partially subsidised by government, was available for "self-improvement through training". The Government member of Malaysia described various incentives to encourage workers to undertake training and retraining, including tax rebates, training grants, low-cost loans and salary increases for increased skills.

38. The Workers' member of Chile emphasised that most adjustment policies and programmes failed to take account of the self-employed and the informal sector. In his country, only 15 per cent of the active labour force worked in large enterprises. There was an explicit need to support the informal sector. Other members mentioned training and related policies and programmes which had served to promote productive self-employment and enterprise development. The Government member of Nigeria described the work of the National Directorate of Employment which was recently established to stimulate self-employment and small enterprise development. The Directorate had organised programmes for school-leavers and graduates of tertiary institutions to develop business skills and entrepreneurial aptitude. These programmes covered all stages of business project development, following which loans were provided at favourable rates to facilitate business start-up. In addition, the Directorate supported open apprenticeship and agricultural training programmes which emphasised self-employment for school-leavers. The Government member of the United Kingdom mentioned a recent scheme in which local education authorities collaborated with enterprises to reorient the curricula in secondary level schools to develop vocational skills which were relevant to local labour markets and to encourage entrepreneurial attitudes and an interest in careers in self-employment. This programme had already had a marked effect on students' attitudes and had strengthened ties between training and education institutions and enterprises.

39. Several members from all three groups elaborated on the respective roles in training of government, public and private sector training institutions, and enterprises. Government should provide for basic education and initial vocational training. Its fundamental role, however, was to provide for basic education and to create a supportive training environment through appropriate policy guidance, tripartite consultations, legislation, financial commitment and the promotion of equity. Governments should function in a catalytic manner, stimulating innovative training programmes to meet the needs and objectives of the labour market and the economy. Employers should assist training institutions in identifying the skills and competencies required by enterprises, and provide training, retraining and further training to present and prospective employees. Examples of collaboration were cited for Canada, Cyprus, Mauritius and the United Kingdom, where employers were members of governing boards or technical committees of training institutions, and represented on local training councils.

The Government member of Germany noted that his government had a major role to play in training the unemployed and those with learning difficulties. Young people with learning difficulties, women, injured workers, and the unemployed were given an opportunity to be trained and to join or return to the labour market through state-financed training programmes outside the framework of the dual system of enterprise training. The Employers' member of Australia said that the need to increase training opportunities for disadvantaged groups was a priority of the tripartite training boards. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that the local Training and Enterprise Councils involved representatives of community organisations which included groups having difficulties or disabilities. The Government member of Japan described specific measures used for the retraining of older workers, noting the need for long-term worker training programmes.

THE SOCIAL COSTS OF ADJUSTMENT AND EQUITY ISSUES

40. The Workers' Vice-Chairman opened the discussion on the social costs of adjustment by observing that members from all groups supported the proposal that the ILO should be more actively involved in influencing the IMF and the World Bank as regards the planning and implementation of structural adjustment programmes. In particular, the ILO should make known the views of the social partners and intensify its promotion of their engagement at all stages. He characterised a decade of adjustment experience as demonstrating the market's inability to yield an adequate solution. In the opinion of the Workers' group it was clear that the laissez-faire approach of governments to adjustment was not tenable. Governments should actively pursue policies to assist vulnerable groups and depressed regions, in particular in rural areas, by providing special measures in education and training as a means of redressing the deterioration of their economic status. While expressing support for employment generation and retraining schemes established under the Social Dimensions of Adjustment Programme, he criticised the inadequate level and the use of funds on expensive external expertise, and noted the lack of tripartite participation in setting priorities, and in programme design, implementation and evaluation.

Turning to the issue of equity, the Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised that training should be seen as part of the wider issue of human resources development. Enormous scope existed for better utilisation of human resources, in particular, measures to promote the full participation of women in society. The pursuit of equality of opportunity and treatment for women in education, training and vocational guidance was essential. To ensure their career options were equal, girls should receive the same education as boys, particularly in non-traditional subjects, and unbiased vocational guidance. He noted, however, that in all regions, significant disincentives persisted, such as: the lack of equal pay for work of equal value; the absence of equal parental rights such that women's careers tended to suffer as a result of their child-caring responsibilities; stereotypes concerning women's roles and capabilities; and discriminatory practices in the workplace. Governments should also seek to provide universal free child care. Such facilities could also be provided by enterprises as a result of collective bargaining. Interventions were necessary to eliminate discrimination as regards promotion and other conditions of employment, to provide equal parental rights and to conduct educational campaigns against sexual harassment. The active intervention by governments was imperative on all of these matters, and measures should be established and subsequently supervised by a tripartite body such as an Equal Opportunity Commission. He noted that the same principles would be applicable to other potentially disadvantaged groups such as ethnic and other minorities, migrant, disabled and older workers. Ensuring the full development and utilisation of these resources, however, would require adequate social protection, health care and other services to increase the ability of these groups to take advantage of education, training and employment opportunities. In this context, he recommended that the ILO undertake a study of the access of migrant workers to education and training to be presented to the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination. He pointed out that specific attention should also be paid to the needs of the rural poor as adjustment programmes had exacerbated urban-rural inequalities. He also pointed out the particularly vulnerable position of workers in the informal sector. With the aim of progressively integrating the informal into the formal sector, they should be given greater access to training. Labour standards and other forms of social protection should gradually be applied. In the opinion of the Workers' group, priority goals of human resources development should include the prohibition of child labour and the gradual formalisation of the informal sector.

41. The Employers' Vice-Chairman noted the importance of anticipatory programmes for the retraining and redeployment of displaced workers. He specifically emphasised the effectiveness of early interventions which would combine retraining with a range of services comprising counselling and placement or job search assistance. Such support would usually entail strengthening public and private employment bureaux and taking steps to reorient vocational training from skills required by declining sectors and industries to those needed in emerging ones. In this regard, he suggested that the dual system as practised in Germany be considered as an effective means of matching supply and demand for skills. He also supported the practice in some countries of requiring employers to give advance notice of anticipated redundancies to facilitate the process of finding alternative employment. While the provision of unemployment benefits to displaced workers genuinely seeking employment might be helpful, he cautioned against too much support of this kind which might discourage an early return to work. Levy schemes and tax rebates could also be used to help enterprises to provide training and skills upgrading courses for workers affected by redundancies. He pointed out the need for surveys of occupational profiles of jobs to provide information on trends in skill requirements in particular emerging skills according to regions and industries.

For workers considering self-employment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman underscored the need for management and entrepreneurship development. Given the importance of the informal sector, he suggested comprehensive programmes of assistance that combined training in business and entrepreneurial skills with access to credit. A fund could also be established to facilitate business start-up. Noting the need for targeted assistance to other vulnerable groups, he singled out the problems confronting displaced workers in rural areas, who should be provided with training and inputs that reflected the technological advances in that sector. Finally, he supported the establishment of high-level national tripartite boards to formulate and review policies to ameliorate the social impacts of structural adjustment. He emphasised, in this regard, the need to adjust the timing of structural adjustment programmes according to a country's needs and capacities. Unnecessarily tight timetables exacerbated the social disruption which ensued.

On the question of equity, the Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed the enactment of legislation to ensure equal opportunity between women and men in both public and private sectors regardless of enterprise size. Such measures would cover training and retraining, job placement and treatment in all aspects of employment, including the criteria for selecting employees to be laid off. He singled out two groups of women requiring specific attention: those re-entering the labour market after a long break and those in rural areas of developing countries whose work in agriculture and home-based cottage industries should be improved. He also noted the need to provide relevant training to older workers who may have wished to continue working.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman then responded to several points made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. In particular he noted that the poor record of structural adjustment programmes in the last decade should not be seen as a failure of market forces but as an outcome of excessive State interventions and mismanagement and the lack of accountability among public enterprises. Furthermore, as regards the impact of adjustment in rural areas, he argued that one of the basic goals of adjustment was to correct rural-urban imbalances by rewarding farmers for their labour by removing price controls which served to discourage agricultural output. Concerning employers' obligation to provide training or retraining of workers, he pointed out that not all enterprises were in a position to do so, and with privatisation new owners would understandably have the prerogative to do what they considered best. He also pointed out that temporary work might be better than no work at all, and one of the possible ways of improving employment had been through work-sharing arrangements. As regards legislating for parents' rights to return to work after a period of child care, while it might be desirable he wondered whether governments would be in a position to make such a guarantee.

42. Several members described measures taken in their countries to mitigate the social costs of adjustment. The Government member of the United States summarised several programmes designed to enhance labour market efficiency and ensure equitable access of disadvantaged groups to training and employment. He emphasised the importance of returning dislocated workers to work as soon as possible and explained that in his country flexible and comprehensive legislation had contributed significantly to the achievement of this objective. In one programme, unemployment insurance provided a temporary wage replacement that allowed eligible unemployed workers to participate in job skills training. Another programme brought together business, education and labour leaders to define the skills and levels necessary to obtain entry-level jobs. Another initiative focused on the vocational training and education system to provide workers with skills for the future. Three groups were targeted: new labour force entrants who required basic job training, persons on public assistance, and displaced workers. The Employment Services programme served as a clearing house for labour market information and provided job counselling and job placement services. He added that many of these programmes involved authorities at the national, state and local levels.

The Employers' members of the United States and the United Kingdom cited initiatives of the business community to collaborate with local level and community education and training institutions to stimulate a greater awareness among students of the world of work and career options. The Employers' member of the United States emphasised the ability of market forces to address long-term needs of education and training, noting the involvement of many enterprises in primary school education. The Government member of Japan explained that a cultural tradition of avoiding dismissal of workers had minimised the negative effects of adjustment in her country. The availability of free, publicly-funded, skills training programmes, together with efforts by some employers' organisations and enterprises to train redundant workers had also helped.

Several members, including the Workers' member of Nigeria, the Government member of Zimbabwe and the Employers' member of Zimbabwe, described successful measures in their countries for training and retraining laid-off workers. The Employers' member of New Zealand cautioned against targeting support programmes to particular skills or industries which he felt would inevitably lead to the exclusion of some important areas of skill development. Priority should be given to the needs of the long-term unemployed. Job search, mobility assistance and work experience programmes, as well as training needs analysis and a qualifications framework which enhanced mobility and recognised achievement were all important. The Government members of the United Republic of Tanzania and India placed priority on efforts to provide self-employment since, in their view, some economies were unable to absorb the people who were completing vocational and technical training. In this context, the Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania argued that structural adjustment programmes designed for industrialised countries having large formal sectors were not appropriate for countries such as his where 80 per cent of the work force was found in the informal sector. Consequently, he felt that most of the training initiatives being described in this Committee would reach and benefit only a minority of workers in his country. Programmes were needed which would be appropriate for informal sector workers having low literacy levels and would make use of adult education and mass media techniques and out-of-school contexts such as public meetings, church or mosque groups. Government members of the United Republic of Tanzania, India, Ethiopia and Zimbabwe also argued that without increased and sustained levels of financial and technical support, the ability of many African countries to bring about the desired reforms and changes would be seriously jeopardised. They stressed the fact that the collapse of the Eastern and Central European economies had also influenced certain countries in Africa, both directly and indirectly, as a result of the shifting of financial support by the industrialised countries.

Other members then described safety net programmes or social funds established under structural adjustment programmes to provide for the social welfare needs of vulnerable or disadvantaged groups usually combined with training and retraining initiatives. The importance of integrating these different yet mutually supportive measures was emphasised. The Government member of Malaysia described the Human Resources Development Fund in his country will operate from a levy from employers and will provide assistance to workers who will be laid off in the future. Training and skill upgrading aimed at enhancing job flexibility.

43. Members of all three groups stressed the importance of efforts to ensure equitable and non-discriminatory access to training and employment opportunities. Equality of opportunity was seen as not only fundamental to social justice, but critical to the full utilisation and development of human resources. It was noted, however, that without special targeted measures the disadvantages experienced by vulnerable groups could be exacerbated in the context of adjustment.

The Employers' member of New Zealand described provisions made in his country under an Equal Opportunities Fund to conduct research, disseminate information and raise awareness among employers of equal opportunity issues. It also provided support for the implementation of enterprise-based programmes to redress the problems identified. The Government member of the United Kingdom added that the key to providing equity in training for disadvantaged groups was to focus on access issues and the obstacles experienced by those groups. Once identified, steps could be taken to remove the barriers. She provided examples of several support services designed to enable specific disadvantaged groups to take advantage of training opportunities, including a communication service for hearing-impaired trainees; a readership service for visually-impaired trainees; and adapted or specialised equipment. In addition, she pointed out that many groups had specific training needs, such as for literacy and numeracy skills, or required special outreach programmes to participate, such as persons living in rural or isolated areas. Another target group needing specific tailored assistance would be women returning to the labour market after a long break who might lack confidence as well as job-related skills.

The access of women to training was a matter of considerable concern in the United Kingdom in view of the need for skilled labour and the unprecedented number of women returning after a career break. Training and Education Councils were responsible for the local delivery of government-funded training and enterprise development programmes. Other efforts focused on making training flexible and responsive to women's domestic responsibilities and included special entry routes, part-time training and support for child care. The Government member of the United States summarised an initiative by his government for women and minority groups, aimed at promoting equal opportunity and "good corporate conduct". It had already demonstrated positive results in terms of identifying the systemic, enterprise-based obstacles to women's career advancement and eliminating them through concrete measures worked out between government and employers.

Many other members including the Government members of Fiji, India, Malaysia, New Zealand and Zimbabwe, referred to policies or programmes in their countries to enhance the access of women to training and noted that special targeted measures were essential to ensure women's access to resources and services. The Workers' member of the Netherlands reported that the rate of long-term unemployment in her country was twice as high for women as for men, due primarily to inequalities in education and training. Despite non-discriminatory legislation and education policies, women did not attain the same levels as men and tended to enter fields of study which were not valued in the labour market. In addition to the measures to be taken by governments and the social partners, the responsibilities of individual employers and the role which might be played by local level work councils deserved attention. Women were disadvantaged in the workplace, including in their access to training, due in part to perceptions of their family responsibilities. The joint employer/worker Labour Foundation in her country encouraged collective bargaining to make specific provisions to improve the position of women workers in jobs where they were currently under-represented. She added that the dual system of training as found in Germany was also successfully implemented in the Netherlands, not only for young workers but for women re-entering the labour market. Finally, she underscored the need for greater attention to be paid to training for older workers and migrant workers. In this context, other members (Employers' member of China; Government members of Fiji and the United Republic of Tanzania) drew specific attention to the need to enhance the opportunities and access to basic education and training of the rural poor, older workers, racial or ethnic minorities and disabled workers and noted that programmes for these groups had to overcome certain social and cultural practices and prejudices.

THE ROLE OF THE SOCIAL PARTNERS

44. The Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised the special role of workers' organisations in ensuring a workplace environment which provided for the needs of workers and guaranteed equal opportunity and treatment. The development and efficient utilisation of human resources could be best achieved in work environments where morale was high, working conditions were good and workers were committed to their work. The type of dynamic, creative workplace capable of responding to the rapid changes and demands of the future depended on the full participation of workers in decisions concerning work organisation and processes. He then commented on the extent to which workers' organisations were engaged in training. They were primarily responsible for bargaining for greater investments in training in the workplace. They also provided a means of channelling the employees' viewpoint on such issues as course content, timing, the participation of workers having family responsibilities, and links to other forms of training. He also noted many examples of courses organised by workers' organisations on occupational safety and health issues, vocational skills, basic literacy and numeracy. He noted that far greater use could be made of workers' organisations in the provision of training, including training for workers in the informal sector.

He emphasised that where training was concerned, governments should seek the involvement and expertise of the social partners, in particular at the local and sectoral levels where they were best placed to articulate the needs to which training should respond. He noted the effectiveness of certain school-to-work transition programmes where employers' and workers' organisations were involved in the development of training programmes for youth carried out in the school system. At the national level, tripartite consultation should be arranged to determine education and training curricula and accreditation to ensure common recognition of qualifications.

45. The Employers' Vice-Chairman emphasised the role of governments in providing an environment conducive to the provision of education and training which met the long and short-term requirements of the economy and society. To do so they should integrate human resources management into their strategic economic and social plans, so that adequate training policies and infrastructure were put in place. Governments should not, however, create bureaucratic barriers to the effective development of human resources in the workplace. The task of defining the training needs of enterprise workers and the programmes to meet these needs should be the role of employers. However, he agreed that workers should have a say in the determination of their training needs and that employers should be responsive to these needs. Training should ideally be conducted at the enterprise level to facilitate a transfer of skills among workers. He added that employers' organisations had an important role to play in stimulating training by enterprises through the provision of information and technical services on the design and implementation of courses. They had also been effective in supporting and providing management and entrepreneurship development programmes.

46. Several members, including the Government member of Fiji and the Workers' member of Australia, noted the need for greater collaboration and consultation between training and education authorities and the social partners to ensure the provision of training and education relevant to the needs of employers and workers. Tripartite training bodies, such as training councils, boards and authorities, offered an appropriate institutional framework for collaboration at national and local levels. The Employers' member of the United States emphasised the contribution that could be made by greater cooperation and consultation between education and training institutions and enterprises to ensure the relevance of education and training to the market. The Government members of Cyprus, Fiji, Japan, Malaysia and Poland described examples of tripartite structures in their respective countries. Although the specific form differed, these bodies were generally responsible for establishing national training policies and systems of skill certification; specifying the content of training courses; and monitoring and evaluating policy and programme implementation. Other members (Workers' member of Australia, Government member of Belgium) indicated a need to ensure acceptable levels of professionalism and good working conditions of teachers and trainers. Several members of Governments (Nicaragua, Algeria, Portugal) emphasised the importance of tripartite cooperation in training needs identification so that both market and societal needs were adequately reflected. They cautioned against restricting training to the specific needs of occupations or enterprises, as it could diminish worker flexibility and mobility. The Government member of Belgium reiterated that adjustment entailed redirecting responsibilities and processes and, therefore, a certain degree of initiative must be given to employers despite the central role of governments. He supported the view that employers had a responsibility to train their personnel, but to safeguard the concerns of workers, training needs should be determined in consultation with workers' organisations. Other members pointed out that the introduction of new forms of work organisation, including participatory forms of management, could contribute to more equitable and efficient structural adjustment at the enterprise level. In this context, the social partners could play an important role in ensuring attitudes, work organisation and incentives that encourage the best use of human capabilities.

The role of the ILO

47. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed that the ILO should assume a leading and catalytic role in promoting the participation of the social partners in all stages of structural adjustment. He also reiterated the ILO should withhold economic assistance from countries violating trade union, human and political rights. ILO actions in this area should be backed up by a strengthened research capacity on the effects of structural adjustment and effective policies and programme responses. The ILO should also assist the social partners in developing their own capacity to analyse adjustment processes and should provide a compendium of policy approaches to mitigate the social costs, particularly for use in developing countries and countries whose economies are in transition. National tripartite conferences should be organised to evaluate adjustment programmes. In this context, he also requested the Committee to consider recommending a second High Level Meeting on structural adjustment. As regards technical cooperation projects in the field of training, emphasis should be placed on the promotion of relevant ILO standards, tripartite cooperation, and safety and health in the workplace. Training and retraining should contribute to improving workers' overall situation. To this end, modules on workers' education could be integrated into vocational training courses and curricula. Following the interest expressed concerning the usefulness of levies, he suggested the ILO prepare a comparative study of national experiences as a basis for advising governments of most cost-effective strategies. Similarly the ILO could provide advice on tripartite processes for establishing standard qualifications for training. Assistance in selecting the appropriate mix of skills training and basic education to prepare qualified workers and on cooperative approaches to preparing youth for the transition from school to work were also requested. These efforts would entail assisting trade unions and employers in jointly developing educational materials for use in schools and training institutions. The ILO could also help governments and the social partners ensure equal access for disadvantaged groups to all education and training programmes. In this regard, he noted particular attention should be given to the rural and urban informal sectors and the needs of women. Finally, he suggested the ILO take stock of national training schemes which were initiated and carried out by non-governmental organisations, including community and other local level groups.

48. The Employers' Vice-Chairman urged the ILO to encourage governments to evaluate the long and short-term training needs of the economy and society and integrate appropriate measures into the national economic and social policy and programme framework. He noted the need to strengthen the support given to small enterprises in the formal and informal sectors. The ILO should play a more forceful role in coordinating information and knowledge on training issues, promoting networking, and building the requisite capacity within countries and enterprises to develop and implement training programmes. In this context he suggested an increased role for the ILO International Training Centre located in Turin.

49. A variety of priority areas for ILO assistance was also identified by other members of the Committee. The provision of ILO technical assistance for the identification of training needs and the planning of training programmes for retrenched civil servants and vulnerable groups was an area of specific concern. Assistance in the field of management and enterprise development was also stressed. Members urged the ILO to prepare information and training materials in all of these areas in collaboration with governments and the social partners. The Government member of Portugal suggested that the ILO provide assistance in forecasting labour market needs as called for in Convention and Recommendation No. 122 concerning employment policy. Other types of technical cooperation were proposed, including technical advisory missions, the transfer of technical knowledge and expertise between developing countries through fellowships, study tours, consultancies, and the supply of publications and training materials. Greater inter-agency collaboration in the field of structural adjustment was strongly suggested with the ILO taking the lead in seeking the cooperation of regional development banks, UNDP, UNESCO, the IMF and the World Bank in focusing attention on mitigating the social costs of adjustment and increasing consultation with employers' and workers' organisations. Several members called for the ILO to take a more aggressive position as regards the IMF and World Bank to ensure that greater attention was paid to the social impact of structural adjustment policies and programmes and that reductions were not made in investments in education and training. To identify the negative impact of adjustment on education and training, the ILO was urged by the Government member of Zimbabwe to undertake research and to evaluate and closely monitor the effects. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania called on the ILO to appoint a study committee to review structural adjustment policies and programmes as advocated by the IMF and World Bank, with a view to reorienting them. Several members stressed the need for ILO to participate in structural adjustment missions organised by the IMF and World Bank. The Government member of the United States characterised the role of the ILO as an "integrator" of tripartite perspectives and experiences. The ILO was urged by several members to take a leading role in social policy and in championing the social dimension of development, particularly in contexts of structural adjustment. The Workers' member of Ghana called for the ILO to renew its commitment to its fundamental principles by assuming a leading role in defending international labour standards throughout the process of adjustment.

Consideration of a working document submitted by the Working Party

50. At the tenth sitting of the Committee, the Reporter introduced the draft Conclusions prepared by the Working Party. There were several clauses on which the Working Party had been unable to reach agreement and these had been placed in square brackets. The Chairman suggested that the Committee proceed paragraph by paragraph to consider the bracketed clauses along with the 196 amendments submitted by members of the Committee.

51. Most amendments were adopted by consensus, rejected or withdrawn following a brief discussion, or in a few cases, referred back to the Office for purely drafting changes. Disputed clauses and amendments are reported in the following paragraphs.

52. The Employers' Vice-Chairman introduced an amendment to paragraph 1 that drew on the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment (1987) emphasising the need for country-specific responses to the adjustment process. The Workers' group indicated its reluctance to introduce the topic of adjustment with an "overly positive" statement. Put to a vote, the amendment was approved with 52,421 votes in favour, 6,555 opposed and 40,641 abstentions. The Committee then discussed an amendment proposed by the Workers' group, which presented what the group considered to be a more accurate reflection of the impact of structural adjustment and democratic processes. The Employers' group and the Government of the United States favoured the existing text. A vote was called and the amendment was rejected due to failure to reach a quorum (48,769): 43,586 votes in favour, 4,712 against, and 57,243 abstentions. The Committee then considered an amendment submitted by the Employers' group concerning factors to which economic structures must adjust. The Workers' group indicated its acceptance if the phrase "international trading patterns" found in the original text but deleted in the amendment was reinserted as a subamendment. The subamendment was adopted, and the amendment duly subamended was then approved. With a few additional minor amendments, paragraph 1 was adopted.

53. An amendment to paragraph 2 introduced by the Workers' Vice-Chairman sought to include among measures taken to facilitate the adjustment process: "promote participation and dialogue with employers' and workers' organisations." The Employers' Vice-Chairman objected to the wording "participation" and, following the suggestion of the Government member of the United States to employ the language consistent with that used in the Report of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, he proposed a subamendment modifying the clause to read "promote dialogue and cooperation with employers' and workers' organisations". The subamendment was accepted and the amendment then adopted as subamended. Another subamendment, proposed by the Employers' group with support from the Workers' group, to an amendment submitted by the Government of Spain, sought to add "new characteristics of work" to the clause in the original text "shifts in the international division of labour" rather than replace it as proposed in the amendment. The subamendment was approved and the amendment adopted with the subamendment. Paragraph 2 was subsequently adopted with the request that a few minor textual changes be made by the Committee secretariat.

54. Paragraph 3 was adopted with no changes in the text. The Committee then considered paragraph 4 and a proposal from the Employers' group that sought to reflect more completely the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment as regards "the principles which should guide the formulation and implementation of structural adjustment programmes". The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated his group's support if the wording were changed slightly to specify "tripartite" consultation and cooperation and respect for basic "ILO" standards as stated in the text of the High-Level Meeting. This subamendment was accepted and the amendment adopted as subamended. Paragraph 4 was subsequently adopted as amended.

55. The Government member of Australia introduced his amendment to paragraph 5 to replace "ensuring new employment opportunities for workers" with "facilitating the redeployment of redundant workers". He pointed out that new employment opportunities could be assumed under situations of adjustment and "redeployment" reflected more accurately the situation. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested the proposed clause be added to the existing text as both situations were relevant. The Employers' group, however, agreed with the amendment and it was subsequently adopted. With the approval of one other minor amendment, the paragraph was then adopted by the Committee.

56. The Committee then considered an amendment to paragraph 6 submitted by the Workers' group to replace the word "need" with "right" in the sentence "Governments should endeavour to ensure universal free access to basic education since this is a fundamental human need ...". The same amendment had also been proposed by the Government members of Austria and Algeria. In the opinion of the Workers' group, the change was essential to underscore the universal and fundamental nature of this right. The Employers' group rejected this view, pointing out that some governments may not be able to meet this requirement under structural adjustment, which might bring them under criticism by the ILO. The Workers' group sought Government support. The amendment was approved and the paragraph subsequently adopted with two other minor amendments.

57. The Committee next discussed paragraph 7 on the formulation of training policies and programmes and the determination of training needs, and an amendment submitted by the Employers' group. In considering the responsiveness of training to changing labour market conditions, the Employers' group stressed that the "employers are the ultimate arbiters of market demand for skills and knowledge. In fact they are the market". The Workers' rejected this view as unnecessarily narrowing the focus of training and ignoring other factors which could influence the demand for skills. Several governments, including the Syrian Arab Republic, Nicaragua and the United States, pointed out some of the limitations of restricting the definition of training needs to market demand. A vote was called and the amendment was rejected: 40,641 votes in favour, 45,353 opposed and 15,314 abstentions.

The paragraph was then adopted with two other amendments, one to include training in occupational safety and health in national training programmes and the [illegible]er to replace "expenditures on" with "investments in" training.

58. The Committee then reviewed an amendment to paragraph 8 proposed by the Employers' group to modify a clause in the original text on the relationship between investments in education and training, job loss and the increasing number of low-skilled and low-wage jobs. The Workers' group proposed a subamendment to retain the part of the original text which specified investments in "skill intensive industry". This subamendment was accepted and the amendment subsequently approved as sub-amended. Paragraph 8 was then adopted following several requests for the Committee secretariat to make minor drafting changes.

59. Paragraph 10 raised the importance of governments exercising political will and allocating sufficient resources to training and education. The Government member of the United Kingdom then explained his amendment to delete the word "substantial" in the clause "the reduction of military spending should enable governments to channel substantial resources to productive and socially beneficial activities, such as education and training". The Employers' group supported the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairman however pointed out the importance of maintaining the original wording to reflect the expectations of a Committee such as this one. The amendment was rejected. The paragraph was then adopted following several requests for the Committee secretariat to clarify the text.

60. The Committee then proceeded to paragraph 11 and an amendment proposed by the Workers' group to replace the words "employers, workers and where appropriate their representative organisations" with the phrase "the social partners". The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that in some situations the social partners might not exist. The Workers' Vice-Chairman referred to the long debate on this topic in the Working Committee and the principle behind the wording, which in the view of his group was basic to the ILO. The Employers' Vice-Chairman cited the language used in Article 6 of Convention No. 144, "where such organisations exist", and in paragraph 12 of the Conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, "workers and employers and where appropriate, their representative organisations". The Government member of the United States requested clarification of the view of the Office. The representative of the Secretary-General referred to Convention No. 87 concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise and to the conclusions of recent industrial committees, pointed out the wide variation in the wording used by various committees and suggested that the Committee should establish its own position in the context of the topic it was discussing, giving due weight to the work of other committees. A vote was subsequently called and the amendment was rejected due to lack of a quorum: 42,997 votes in favour, 1,767 opposed and 58,311 abstentions. The Workers' Vice-Chairman then proposed a subamendment to the rejected amendment, which was ruled out of order by the Chairman. Referring to paragraph 54 of the ILO Guide for the Secretariat, the Workers' Vice-Chairman then proposed to provide a new amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General was subsequently called on to clarify procedures. He indicated that according to article 63 of the Standing Orders on the timing of submission of amendments, such action was not permissible. The Workers' group disputed the ruling. Advice of the Office's legal adviser was sought and, after consultation, the decisions of the representative of the Secretary-General and the Chairman were sustained. The Committee adjourned for a short period for the Workers' group to deliberate.

61. Paragraph 12 was slightly amended and adopted. The Committee then considered an amendment to paragraph 13 proposed by the Employers' members which was intended to give countries a wider choice in the systems which they established for formulating and reviewing training policies. In the opinion of the Government member of Nicaragua, from a legal perspective the amendment presupposed the creation of a private company rather than a public institution. The Employers' Vice-Chairman withdrew his group's amendment and supported instead an amendment proposed by the Government member of Austria. This amendment was accepted and paragraph 13 was adopted. Paragraphs 14, 15, 16 and 17 were subsequently adopted following minor amendments.

62. The Employers' group proposed an amendment to paragraph 18 to replace a reference to linking "enterprises and unions" with the phrase "employers, workers, and their representatives where appropriate". Put to a vote, the amendment received 46,531 votes in favour, no votes against and 50,654 abstentions. Since the quorum was not reached, the amendment was rejected. The paragraph was adopted without amendment.

63. The Workers' group proposed an amendment to paragraph 19 emphasising the need for "a genuinely collaborative joint approach of employers and unions to raising productivity and wages and improving working conditions". Enterprise reforms to promote this aim and increase staff participation would be duly negotiated between management and unions. The Employers' Vice-Chairman responded that the emphasis should be on training rather than on wages and working conditions and the primary involvement that of employers and workers. He pointed out that unions could be included only where they were already represented in an enterprise. This amendment was rejected. The Committee then considered another amendment which had been proposed by the Workers' group to replace the last sentence of the paragraph, "Empowerment schemes, introducing work in teams and providing workers increased pay for improving their skills and raising productivity can all contribute to the development of a more harmonious enterprise culture", with "The social partners should pursue these objectives through negotiations and improve wages and working conditions as a consequence." This amendment was accepted. Following minor amendments, paragraph 19 was adopted.

64. The Committee then considered an amendment to paragraph 20 proposed by the Employers' members to replace the bracketed text which emphasised financial levies as the main instrument of governments to ensure funding of training on an equitable basis. Reference was made to various measures to achieve this goal which had been introduced successfully in different countries. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed a subamendment deleting the clause "as detailed above" which was accepted. The amendment was then adopted. Following three further minor amendments, paragraph 20 was adopted.

65. The Committee proceeded to an amendment proposed by the Government member of Australia to insert in paragraph 21, dealing with the need for information systems, a sentence from paragraph 26 which referred to the need for regular surveys of skill needs. The Government member of Australia explained this amendment widened the scope of reference to cover the importance of such surveys in planning both training and retraining programmes. The Workers' Vice-Chairman supported the amendment. The Government member of Nicaragua emphasised the importance of surveys of skill needs in both Latin America and Eastern Europe to determine training and retraining programmes. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated his agreement. The amendment was approved and paragraph 21 was adopted.

66. Paragraphs 22 and 23 were adopted without amendment. Paragraphs 24 and 25 were adopted with minor uncontested amendments. An amendment to paragraph 26 to delete the final sentence following the insertion into paragraph 21 of a similar but broader text as mentioned above was accepted. With one further slight amendment, paragraph 26 was adopted.

67. Paragraphs 27, 28 and 29 were then adopted with minor amendments, while paragraphs 30 and 31 were adopted without amendment.

68. Turning to paragraph 32, the Committee considered and accepted an amendment proposed by the Government member of the United States, to add at the end of the paragraph a reference to the need for "special attention to be given to encouraging an entrepreneurial approach and developing the necessary skills for enterprise development". The paragraph was adopted as amended. Paragraph 33 was adopted with a minor amendment.

69. The Employers' Vice-Chairman introduced an amendment to paragraph 34 aimed at replacing the reference in the first line to the role of employers' and workers' organisations in the formulation of training policies and implementation of training programmes, with a reference to consultation on these matters, according to national law and practice, by "employers, workers and their representatives, as appropriate". The Government member of Nicaragua considered that this proposal ran counter to the ILO's commitment to the role of employers' and workers' organisations. The amendment was subsequently rejected. The alternative bracketed clauses were replaced, following a subamendment proposed by the Workers' group to an amendment which had been put forward by the Employers' group, with a similar reference to "employers' and workers' organisations" while the bracketed words "of their members" were deleted. Further amendments proposed by the Workers' group to recognise equally the role of employers' and workers' organisations in defining training needs were accepted. Finally, on the basis of a subamendment by the Workers' group to an amendment which had been proposed by the Employers' group, the words "production system" were replaced with "economy".

70. Paragraph 35 was subsequently adopted after being amended to reflect the Committee's decision on paragraph 34 on the need to consult "employers' and workers' organisations" in determining national systems of skill certification and the content of training courses.

71. The Committee subsequently considered an amendment submitted by the Workers' members that proposed replacing the initial wording of "in bargaining for greater investments in training by enterprises . . .", in the square brackets in paragraph 37 with the words "in negotiating better training by enterprises, its extension to workers not adequately covered, and . . .". The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated his group did not accept the amendment. He argued that training was an "organic function of business". Training should not be a bargaining issue and negotiating for investments in training did not augur well. The Government member of Austria asked the Workers' Vice-Chairman whether the amendment implied for example, that in negotiations, training hours would be accepted in place of a reduction in working hours. The Workers' Vice-Chairman replied that the proposed wording covered all aspects of training and was not meant to be prescriptive. The amendment was adopted. Several minor modifications were also accepted followed by the adoption of the paragraph. Paragraphs 36 and 38 were also adopted with minor modifications.

72. The Committee then adopted an amendment submitted by the Workers' members proposing that in paragraph 39 reference be made to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). It then referred several editorial changes to the Committee secretariat for review and adopted paragraph 39 with one additional minor modification. Paragraphs 40 (b), (d), (e) and (g) were adopted without change as were 40 (a), (c), (f) and (h) with slight amendments.

73. The Committee then turned its attention to the sentence in brackets at the end of paragraph 41 (a) stating "The ILO should not enter into technical cooperation agreements with governments that systematically violate trade union or other human or political rights." The Workers' Vice-Chairman reiterated his group's position explaining that the conditionality was based on their concern for the systematic and not just random violations of fundamental rights of workers which represent the cornerstone of ILO activities.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman argued that in the opinion of his group, the bracketed clause should be deleted from the text. He noted that the ILO had established its own supervisory machinery to investigate violations of standards. Referring to the discussion of international labour standards and technical cooperation that took place during the 252nd Session of the ILO Governing Body, 2-6 March, 1992, he quoted the report (GB 252/15/1, paragraph 34): "Finally, in the absence of a constitutional basis and precise instructions formulated by the Conference on the Governing Body, it is not within the power of the Office to take a decision to sanction violations of ILO standards by the withdrawal of technical cooperation." He added that the ILO should not place in greater jeopardy the poor and other disadvantaged groups by bringing additional pressure to bear on countries through placing conditions on the assistance it provides.

74. In an effort to find a compromise, the Workers' Vice-Chairman requested clarification from the Government member of the United States concerning his intention to prepare an alternative text. The Government member of the United States subsequently proposed to add, at the end of the brackets, the clause "unless such assistance will further these rights". He explained the rationale behind this clause was to allow the ILO the flexibility to provide the assistance needed by countries to improve their record in regard to compliance with ILO standards and respect of basic human rights.

Indicating his group's support of this subamendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman subsequently withdrew an amendment his group had submitted, which proposed inserting after the word "agreements" in the bracketed clause the words "except covering humanitarian assistance". He also pointed out the bracketed text did not state that the ILO should "withdraw" assistance but rather "not enter into" agreements.

75. Several members acknowledged their support for respecting fundamental human rights, but expressed concern about creating rigidities which could work against the achievement of the objectives set out in the relevant ILO standards. The Government member of the Netherlands, noting the very sensitive nature of the matter and the extensive Governing Body discussion of the issue in March, proposed as another alternative, the text: "The ILO should bear in mind the discussion in the Governing Body in March 1992 concerning ILO technical assistance". The Government member of Germany indicated his support of the proposal of the Government member of the United States, noting the need to support the poor in countries where governments did not respect human rights. The Governing Body document quoted by the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that while the Office cannot decide, the Governing Body and the Conference can, and this Committee can suggest a course of action. The Government member of Gabon supported the deletion of the text in brackets, stating that it was better to give people a chance to fight oppression in their countries by becoming educated and trained.

The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated his group was not in favour of the proposal. The Government member of Australia then suggested putting the issue more positively and proposed the following text as an alternative to the bracketed text: "Consistent with ILO objectives and practices, technical cooperation should be provided in a manner which takes account of the particular circumstances of each country and strengthens the capacity of governments in consultation with the social partners, to ratify and implement ILO standards." The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his approval if the text were modified to state "technical cooperation in education and training". The Workers' Vice-Chairman responded by saying his group could not agree to the proposal nor the change suggested by the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

76. The Chairman of the Committee proposed to defer further consideration of the bracketed text in paragraph 41 (a) to the end of the session, to permit the Secretariat to try to find a compromise text. This proposal was approved.

77. Paragraph 41 (b) was adopted without change, paragraph 41 (d) adopted with minor amendments and a new paragraph 41 (e) inserted. The Committee then adopted paragraphs 42 (b), (d), (e), and (f) without change, paragraph 42 (a) with a slight modification and 42 (c) with the text in square brackets retained. Paragraphs 43 (a), (b), (c) and (d) were adopted without change.

78. The Committee then returned to the text in square brackets at the end of paragraph 41 (a). The Chairman reported that attempts to find a compromise text that might have been offered as a subamendment had failed and it was therefore necessary to vote on the bracketed text. Since the Employers' and the Workers' groups maintained their respective positions, the outcome of the vote was contingent on the government members. Those voting in favour of deleting the text in brackets were 14, with 5 opposed. With the text in brackets removed, paragraph 41 (a) was adopted without further modification.

79. At its 13th sitting, after several minor changes to the report and to the Conclusions, the Committee adopted its report, the resolution and the Conclusions. The Vice-Chairmen, speaking on behalf of their respective groups, and the Government member of Fiji, praised the spirit of cooperation that prevailed among the three groups and thanked the Chairman for his constructive role and the Secretariat for its effective collaboration.

80. The report, the resolution and the Conclusions are submitted to the Conference for its consideration.

Resolution concerning adjustment and human resources development

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having taken note of Report VI on adjustment and human resources development:

1. Adopts the following conclusions;

2. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General:

(a) to bring these conclusions to the attention of member States and of employers' and workers' organisations;

(b) to take these conclusions into account in preparing future activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Conclusions concerning adjustment and human resources development

INTRODUCTION

1. All countries need to pursue policies that enable adjustment to the changing conditions of an interdependent world economy. Such policies should contribute to an international effort to promote growth, increase investment and overcome the debt crisis. There can, of course, be no general or universal prescription for the achievement of these goals; each country's situation is different and policies need to be designed that are specific to national problems and perspectives. For example, rising interest rates have had a particularly adverse impact on developing countries. Countries at all levels of development, however, have been reviewing and changing policies that have led to stagnation, unemployment and declining competitiveness. They also have had to adjust their economic structures in response to the trend towards democracy, as well as to changes in technology, changes in international trading patterns and to new market forces. Structural adjustment is a corrective process aimed at achieving improved living standards, full employment, competitive and profitable undertakings, and sustainable, non-inflationary economic growth. The magnitude and intensity of these adjustments have varied according to the initial conditions of an economy. Economies that are competitive, and have well-functioning markets, responsive economic and social institutions, and effective social protection have tended to adjust most smoothly. Those countries without these advantages face difficult challenges of adjustment, including the need for major policy and institutional reforms as well as special policies to mitigate the social costs of adjustment. In all countries, securing the highest possible level of education and training for all workers is vital for structural adjustment as well as for economic and social progress.

2. Both the nature of adjustment and its effects differ amongst countries at different levels of development and among regions. In industrialised and newly industrialising economies, adjustment consists primarily of the adaptation of the industrial structure to technological change; improved work organisation and practices; shifts in the international division of labour; new characteristics of work; and the successful development of an entrepreneurial spirit in the economy. In transition economies, the adjustment process is more complex, involving the formulation of new policies to cope with the closure of many uncompetitive industries and the development of institutions necessary for a market economy. In developing countries, adjustment often has to be implemented against a background of a heavy burden of external debt and widespread poverty. This imposes severe constraints on their ability to bring about major reforms necessary for economic recovery and long-term growth while having at the same time to prevent an aggravation of already high levels of poverty. These countries often require external assistance to achieve the objectives of their structural adjustment programmes. Such programmes need to pay special attention to the social dimensions of adjustment and the pace and intensity of reforms have to be framed with these considerations in mind. In all countries, structural adjustment policies should be formulated in agreement with the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in 1987, which suggested, among other things, appropriate measures to encourage sustained, non-inflationary growth, increase the adaptability of the labour force and economic enterprise, overcome the debt burden of developing countries, promote international trade, stimulate fuller employment, promote dialogue and cooperation with employers' and workers' organisations, reduce poverty and mobilise the support of international organisations to facilitate action by governments to these ends.

3. In this context, the conclusions of the ILO's High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment need to be re-emphasised. In particular, it is important to recall the principles which should guide the formulation and implementation of structural adjustment programmes. These include: the need to protect the poorest and most vulnerable groups from the negative effects of adjustment programmes; the maintenance and extension of an open world trading system recognising that protectionism in all its various forms delays needed adjustment; the need to reduce debt; the promotion of tripartite consultation and cooperation; respect for basic ILO standards; and the promotion of collective bargaining.

4. Adjustment programmes should be implemented on the basis of full respect for democratic principles, human rights and social consensus. They should also attempt to ensure a fair distribution of the costs and rewards of the process of adjustment. Successful adjustment requires policies that are complementary and economically, politically and socially sustainable. Labour standards should not be violated and changes in these standards should be introduced only after full tripartite consultations on the issue. Every effort should be made to prevent any excessive widening of social inequalities.

5. Education and training are preconditions for achieving economic growth and vital ingredients for the success of adjustment programmes. In addition, they enhance the ability of enterprises to respond more effectively to their customers' needs. The education process, for which governments have the primary responsibility, should have as one of its main outputs an increase in the ability and motivation of all individuals to learn and to acquire the level of education necessary to play a full and active part in the democratic process. By providing workers with the skills required in new industries education and training support the growth of these industries while at the same time facilitating the redeployment of redundant workers. In addition, by upgrading the skills of the workforce, training enhances the capacity of an economy to adopt new technologies and new forms of work organisation, thereby raising the productivity and international competitiveness of industries. Training can also make a crucial contribution to enterprise creation, including productive and freely chosen self-employment, a strategic component of economic growth.

6. Raising the general level of education and improving basic skills such as literacy, numeracy, problem-solving ability and communication skills are important social and economic objectives. Governments should consequently endeavour to ensure universal free access to basic education since this is a fundamental human right and an obligation of government. Workers should also be given opportunities for personal development, education and skill upgrading at appropriate stages in their working lives. Education and training also contribute importantly to the attainment of social objectives such as the advance of democracy, broader social participation, greater industrial democracy, improved industrial relations and social stability. Well-educated and trained workers are more employable, better equipped to assume responsibility and accountability, more easily change jobs, and are better able to participate effectively in the affairs of enterprises and society.

7. To realise these potential benefits, education and training policies have to be guided by several important considerations. One basic requirement is that the education and training system should be flexible and responsive to changing labour market conditions. This maximises both the individual and social benefits derived from investments in education and training. Individuals find employment appropriate to their skills, enterprises obtain the types of workers they need and society benefits from fuller employment and higher productivity. However, education and training policies also have to meet important social objectives. Consequently, market forces should not be the only determinant of the educational and training needs of society. These needs should be defined through a democratic process that takes full account of the long-term goals of society, the development of national culture and the preferences of individuals. Equitable and non-discriminatory access to training opportunities is a precondition for equal employment opportunities. Training is also a potentially powerful instrument for improving the integration of disadvantaged groups into economic and social life. Training policies focused on women, the poor, the unemployed, older workers, youth, minority groups and disabled persons can significantly enhance their employability. Training in occupational safety and health is an important component of an integrated national training programme.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING IN RESPONSE TO STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENT

8. Structural adjustment programmes, especially in their early phase, have often caused declines in levels of economic activity, lower tax receipts and reductions in government expenditures. As a result, many countries have been forced to cut their public expenditures, including expenditures on education and training. The results of those cuts have often been negative, contributing to the erosion of countries' endowment of skills and knowledge and thereby jeopardising their prospects of recovery and sustained, long-term economic development. In some circumstances, budget cuts for education and training may have disproportionately affected poorer groups who have seen their access to education and training and prospects for future employment and income earning opportunities reduced. In some countries, the lack of appropriate investments in education and training and the failure to encourage investment, especially in skill-intensive industry, have contributed to the increase in the number of low-skilled, low-wage jobs and to job loss.

9. It is important for governments to avoid these negative effects and to strengthen the positive contribution that education and training can make to support successful adjustment. Education provides the general literacy, numeracy, communication, scientific and problem-solving skills that improve the individual's ability to adapt to change and learn new skills. Training, when responsive to the changing needs of the labour market, can facilitate the adjustment process by equipping workers with the specific skills needed to shift from declining to expanding sectors of economic activity. It can provide skills necessary to become productively self-employed. By raising the productivity and adaptability of workers, education and training increase enterprises' competitiveness and their ability to adjust to rapidly changing markets and consumer preferences. By increasing the occupational, regional and functional mobility of workers, education and training increase the efficiency of labour markets and allow workers to orient themselves vocationally and choose jobs in which they will be most productive. Experience shows that investments in a good educational system, followed by appropriate training efforts for workers, when combined with appropriate national policies and enterprise structures, contribute significantly to rapid economic and social development, even in circumstances when natural resources are limited. Education and training therefore constitute an essential element in a virtuous circle consisting of training and skill development, higher work motivation, higher productivity, continuous adjustment of enterprises and workers to change, higher employment and increased incomes and well-being.

10. Governments should have the political will to mobilise all appropriate human, material and financial resources to reverse the negative impact that stabilisation and adjustment have had on education and training in many countries. For example, the reduction of military spending should enable governments to channel substantial resources to productive and socially beneficial activities, such as education and training. Improved targeting and greater cost-effectiveness in the use of public expenditures will also make an important contribution to boosting education and training programmes to adequate levels. Governments should mobilise resources for education and training on the grounds of both equity and impact on the economy: equity because the burden of adjustment should not fall disproportionately on the least educated and least able to pay, and economically because increased investment in human resources would have an expansionary effect on the economy and increase the availability of skills. Where cost recovery measures have been introduced the effect has often been to limit the access of low-income groups to education and training. Safeguards should therefore be established to ensure that the fees charged do not constitute an insurmountable barrier to the poor.

11. The mobilisation of non-governmental sources of funding for education and training should be given high priority. Adjustment has encouraged a variety of actors, including enterprises, trade unions, national and local governments, non-governmental organisations and community groups, to develop innovative responses to the need for education and training in order to cope with adjustment. Government and the social partners should encourage enterprises to engage in business-education partnerships, promote community training institutions and undertake other activities conducive to expanding access to training opportunities. Education and training institutions should be encouraged to support adjustment by expanding their training programmes for business creation and promotion and distance learning. Employers, workers and, where appropriate, their representative organisations should cooperate in establishing comprehensive training programmes, including improvements of existing schemes.

12. The use of low-cost, innovative training methods offers another means of maximising the impact of limited training resources and overcoming the effects of budgetary restrictions. Most conventional training methods are expensive for developing countries and can reach only a small proportion of the population needing access to education and training. Large numbers of workers in the urban informal and rural sectors, as well as the growing number of unemployed workers, require access to training in order to improve their situation. Governments, enterprises, education and training institutions, workers' and employers' organisations and other training providers should therefore give priority to developing and disseminating low-cost training methods that save on scarce resources without compromising the quality of training. These would include audio-visual training methods, training by correspondence, distance learning and new, cost-effective instructional technologies.

COMPREHENSIVE HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT POLICIES

13. Comprehensive human resource development policies should be formulated by governments in consultation with the social partners. Governments and the social partners may consider vesting in a tripartite national training authority or other nationwide board the tasks of formulating and reviewing national training policies. A basic objective should be to promote the creation of an institutional framework and infrastructure for implementing these policies.

14. Comprehensive human resources policies should be formulated and implemented within the framework of adherence to democratic principles, tripartism, and consultation between the government, the social partners and community groups. This will ensure maximum popular support for these policies and create a collective ownership of solutions to problems of training and skill development.

15. Under the overall umbrella of comprehensive human resources development policies, a new division of roles in training should be envisaged among governments, training institutions and the social partners. It is incumbent on governments to create an economic and social climate favourable to learning and skill development, as well as to ensure basic education and training. Governments are responsible for providing the economic and social framework that promotes long-term growth. They should make training policy and investments in education and training an integral element of long-term strategic planning and economic policy-making. Governments should mobilise public and private resources for education and training and create a supportive policy environment that encourages enterprises, training institutions and other actors to invest in training and that promotes and supports the individual's desire for learning and skill development.

16. In the context of comprehensive human resources policies, governments should ensure an effective and supportive infrastructure for training. This infrastructure should be capable of responding quickly to the specific needs of local labour markets by promoting training that meets the demand of enterprises and individuals for skills and employment-related qualifications. Governments should maintain a system of certification of skills and accreditation of institutions in order to ensure the quality and comparability of training. They should also define the desired core competencies required for improved economic and enterprise performance and ensure that vocational qualifications provide links to career advancement by giving workers access to higher levels of education. Governments should provide incentives for firms and individuals to engage in training activities, offer vocational guidance and counselling services, and also provide training support to small and medium-sized firms and the self-employed, often lacking the resources to organise and finance their own training. While preserving their role as catalyst and regulator of national laws affecting training, they may, where adequate alternatives exist, consider reducing their role in providing training programmes.

17. Structural and technological change create demand for new skills and make it necessary to develop new forms of training. Training and education in today's rapidly changing labour markets cannot take place only in schools and training institutions. Theoretical instruction combined with practical training is widely recognised as an effective means of facilitating the transition between school and the world of work. There is therefore a need increasingly to make use of the enterprises that are capable of organising this kind of training. It is also important to exploit innovative training schemes that in various forms combine school-based education with practical training and which offer a variety of choices in career and skill development. The best prospects for adapting training is therefore in the development of various links between schools, public and private training institutions and enterprises.

18. An important objective of human resources development policies should be to make training respond better to the demand for skills and knowledge of the economy, enterprises and individuals. This can be achieved by strengthening tripartite consultations on training objectives and content, decentralising training decisions from central training authorities to regional and local community bodies and by linking enterprises, unions and training institutions in activities related to curriculum development, enrolment planning, vocational guidance and student placement. These measures are likely to improve the ability of training institutions and individual programme managers to adjust their training programmes to enterprises' and the economy's needs for skills and qualifications. They are also likely to contribute to greater equity in access to education and training.

19. Successful adjustment depends on improved company performance, which cannot be achieved without a more skilled workforce and the creation of an enterprise culture that can harness the creative and productive potential of workers and prepare them for change. It can be promoted by enterprise reforms that would increase staff participation in matters affecting their daily work, improve work organisation and practices and promote positive attitudes to change. In particular, education and training to upgrade staff skills will contribute to breaking down those hierarchical working relations that stifle initiative and prevent mobility and career advancement. The social partners should pursue these objectives through negotiations and improve wages and working conditions as a consequence.

20. Enterprises benefit greatly from training and have a responsibility to make a financial contribution to its costs. Many experiences around the world demonstrate that there are several ways in which governments can encourage enterprises to improve the quantity and quality of training. Measures which have been introduced successfully in different countries include levy schemes on enterprise payrolls to finance training, tax rebates based on expenses incurred in training, subsidising part of training costs, and the channelling of public funds through national, regional and local bodies on which the social partners are represented. It is also argued that, if properly managed, a levy can contribute to a more equitable sharing of the costs of training, raise employers' awareness about the importance of training for enterprise success and encourage them to review their investments and provisions for training. In undertaking these measures governments should ensure that they are not just financing bureaucratic institutions, but that funding is effectively used to promote skill development activities for enterprises. Governments can encourage employers to undertake training through financing innovative promotion schemes, workplace reforms, training awards, and the exchange of information about best practices in training.

21. Policy-makers, training institutions and enterprises require accurate, up-to-date information about the demand for and supply of skills in order to design relevant training programmes. Training institutions, the social partners and policy-makers should collaborate in developing such information systems. Regular surveys of skill needs should be instituted to support the planning of training and retraining programmes and to increase labour capabilities.

CONTAINING THE SOCIAL COSTS OF ADJUSTMENT

22. In developing countries undergoing structural adjustment, the initial phase is often associated with recession; a consequent rise in unemployment; a decline in real wages and the earnings of the self-employed; and reduced social expenditures. This is often exacerbated by the retrenchment of civil servants and employees of state enterprises as a result of cuts in public budgets and the phasing out of unprofitable state enterprises. These developments can be of long duration in cases where structural adjustment measures are ineffective, incomplete or are slow in producing the anticipated revival of economic growth. In these circumstances, special measures should be considered to mitigate the social costs of adjustment. These measures include the retraining of retrenched workers; the promotion of productive and freely chosen self-employment through training, credit and other support programmes; and targeted social assistance for the most vulnerable.

23. In many developing countries such measures are part of structural adjustment programmes and are usually implemented through social funds which are partly financed by external assistance. While this is a welcome development, there is significant room for improvement. The resources available under such social funds are often meagre in relation to the scale of the needs. Increased external assistance is called for, especially in the case of least developed countries. Where the social costs of adjustment are particularly acute, it may be necessary to reconsider the pace of implementation of certain aspects of structural adjustment programmes.

24. These social funds are normally implemented without the involvement of the social partners. They can be made more effective, more relevant and enjoy wider support if the social partners are consulted in their management. Tripartite consultations on programme priorities, project design, implementation and evaluation will ensure greater sensitivity to the needs of potential beneficiaries and result in more participative forms of programme implementation. In addition, national tripartite consultation on the design of overall structural adjustment programmes would make a significant contribution to minimising the social costs of structural adjustment.

25. Active policies focused on vulnerable groups and depressed regions should be implemented in all countries undergoing economic restructuring. The loss of unproductive jobs is an inevitable consequence of economic restructuring and anticipatory policies for retraining and redeployment of displaced workers should constitute an integral part of adjustment programmes. Retraining programmes must respond to the new demands in the labour market and the intervention must be as early as possible and accompanied by a full range of services such as assistance in job search, vocational guidance and placement. Countries that provide unemployment benefits should ensure that they provide a basic income. However, the level and duration of benefits should encourage an early return to work and thereby increase the effectiveness of retraining programmes. It is also important to integrate training and retraining policy with employment, welfare and income support policies since these policies are inter-related and should be mutually compatible and supportive.

26. Apart from government-run programmes, retraining opportunities can also be expanded by providing incentives to private enterprises to organise retraining programmes. These incentives have taken different forms in different countries, depending on national law and practice, and have included grants drawn from training levies, tax rebates and tax credits as well as relevant community-based training initiatives.

EQUITY IN TRAINING

27. Equality of access to training is a requirement for the elimination of discrimination in economic and social life. Every effort should therefore be made to ensure equitable and non-discriminatory access to training opportunities. Equity issues assume a heightened significance during structural adjustment because disadvantaged groups are particularly vulnerable to a deterioration in their economic condition and reduced opportunities for training. Special measures to prevent this are therefore required.

28. Governments have the primary responsibility for ensuring equal and non-discriminatory access to training and consequently should establish an appropriate body to ensure that this is done. Equal opportunity commissions should, where appropriate, be established. These commissions can make an important contribution to the elimination of discrimination in training and employment on the grounds of gender, religion, ethnic origins, age or disability. Such commissions can stimulate the introduction of equal opportunity legislation and monitor its enforcement. They can also promote voluntary action to reduce discrimination through funding research and action programmes in this area. Furthermore, they can undertake research to identify systemic barriers to the integration of the disadvantaged into mainstream training and employment and to formulate measures to remove these barriers.

29. In most societies, the employment opportunities for women are substantially less than those for men, and programmes to eliminate discrimination against women in education, training and employment merit special attention. A comprehensive set of measures needs to be introduced and executed to ensure gender equality. Equal opportunity legislation needs to be supplemented by measures such as the creation of equal parental rights, the provision of child care facilities, campaigns against sexual harassment, and information programmes to change the attitudes of employers and workers and break cultural stereotypes that are detrimental to women. Special measures to promote equal access to educational and training opportunities are also important. These include the provision of vocational guidance and other measures to encourage women to enter non-traditional fields of training. The design of training programmes should make allowance for the time constraints women face because of family responsibilities.

30. Special training programmes should be provided for other disadvantaged groups such as ethnic minorities, migrant workers, older workers, marginalised youth and disabled persons. These programmes should aim at integrating such disadvantaged groups into the mainstream of economic and social life. In order to maximise their effectiveness, the design of these programmes has to take into account the special needs of particular groups. Measures such as training in language and numeracy skills may have to precede vocational training, and institutional support in the form of child-care and other facilities may be required to encourage participation. It is also desirable to design customised training initiatives based on an assessment of individual and enterprise needs. Although governments have the main responsibility for financing and organising these programmes, initiatives by employers' organisations, enterprises, trade unions, international and national NGOs and community organisations should be encouraged. Where possible these organisations should be used as implementing agencies of training programmes.

31. Among these disadvantaged groups, migrant workers deserve special attention in view of their growing numbers and the severe difficulties they face in gaining access to training opportunities. These difficulties often spring from their insecure status in host countries and their unfamiliarity with local languages and cultures.

32. Developing countries face a major challenge in extending training opportunities to large numbers of the poor, who are normally illiterate or semi-literate, in rural areas and in the urban informal sector. Intensive programmes need to be organised that involve basic literacy training and supporting measures to boost income-generating opportunities, provide basic social protection and promote collective action by informal sector producers and workers. In view of the large numbers that must be reached, audio-visual and other innovative and low-cost alternatives to conventional training programmes should be used. Special attention should be given to encouraging an entrepreneurial approach and developing the necessary skills for enterprise development.

33. Training and other programmes directed at the informal sector in developing countries should have as a basic objective the progressive integration of this sector into the formal sector. Training programmes have to be supported by the provision of basic infrastructure and credit. Special efforts should be made to remove constraints to the integration of small informal sector enterprises into the formal sector by increasing their productivity and ability to meet accepted business practices in the formal sector. Basic social protection should be provided to informal sector producers and workers placing particular emphasis on freedom of association and freedom from forced labour, the development of some elementary forms of social security, and providing information and training to informal sector enterprises on measures that can be taken to reduce exposure to occupational safety and health risks. Governments should support the initiatives to improve social protection in the informal sector undertaken by producer cooperatives, trade unions and other groupings in that sector.

ROLE OF THE SOCIAL PARTNERS

34. Employers' and workers' organisations should participate actively in the formulation of national and sectoral training policies and in the implementation of training programmes at the national, regional and local levels. Workers' organisations have a major role in encouraging their members to undertake training. Both employers' and workers' organisations have an important role to play in defining the current and future training needs of the economy and thereby ensuring that the training system is fully responsive to market needs. Employers' and workers' organisations have a contribution to make in ensuring that training policies and programmes are sensitive to training needs broader than those solely determined by the market as well as to equity issues.

35. Employers' and workers' organisations should be consulted in determining national systems of skill certification and the content of training courses. They can also contribute to the monitoring and evaluation of training policies. Of particular importance is the feedback they can provide to policy-makers on whether the current policy environment provides sufficient incentives for enterprises to train and for workers to undertake training. In addition they can provide regular feedback on performance to training institutions.

36. Employers' organisations have an important role to play in stimulating training by enterprises through the provision of information and technical services on the design and implementation of industry and plant-level courses that would facilitate the access of workers to training. These services will be particularly useful for small enterprises. Management training and entrepreneurship development programmes run or supported by employers' organisations are particularly useful additions to national training efforts. Similarly, initiatives by enterprises such as the setting up of training centres for deprived urban youth and the organisation of retraining programmes for displaced workers contribute significantly to the attainment of social objectives. Employers can also stimulate training through promoting work organisation and payments systems that value and reward skill acquisition. Collaboration between enterprises and training institutions in training initiatives should be encouraged.

37. Workers' organisations play an important role in organising training programmes for their members and in negotiating better training by enterprises, its extension to workers not adequately covered, and the provision of adequate incentives and assistance for workers to acquire additional skills. Workers' organisations can also play a very important role in providing training in occupational safety and health and in ensuring that training programmes in enterprises are sensitive to the special needs of women workers and young workers. They can also make a significant contribution to poverty alleviation through training programmes for rural and urban informal sector workers.

38. Industrial relations approaches that allow for consultation and cooperation can play an important role in facilitating the introduction of new, more flexible, forms of work organisation and production technologies that permit enterprises to adjust to rapidly changing and increasingly competitive markets; and to encourage the integration of training into the overall enterprise strategy.

ACTION BY THE ILO

39. The activities of the ILO in the promotion of human resources development must be seen in the context of national circumstances and relevant international labour standards, particularly the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 1975 (No. 150), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). They also need to be planned and developed within the framework established by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in 1987. In addition these activities need to be sharply focused to make the best use of limited ILO resources to promote human resources development. Outputs should be assessed and the cost-effectiveness of specific activities and projects evaluated. There are four areas described in paragraphs 40-43 below which the ILO should continue to emphasise in its efforts to ensure the critical importance of human resources development in economies faced with the demands of structural adjustment. In continuing to emphasise these efforts the ILO should:

40. In respect of human resources development policies

(a) strengthen its leadership role in advocating that investment in human resources development and especially in basic education and in vocational training is a priority of governments and the social partners during structural adjustment; not only to facilitate the process of adjustment but, in addition, to ensure the equal participation of all individuals and the social groups in the labour market and to maintain or increase the skills of workers necessary for long-term economic and social development;

(b) intensify continuing dialogue between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions in order to maintain expenditures in education and training during adjustment programmes. This advocacy should be supported by in-depth analytic studies, information dissemination, advisory services and, where appropriate, participation in structural adjustment missions;

(c) encourage and facilitate consultation with the social partners when structural adjustment programmes are being designed and negotiated. The ILO should encourage and assist the social partners to participate fully in such consultations by helping them to develop their capacity to analyse structural adjustment issues within the framework of broad national social, especially educational, and economic objectives;

(d) assist governments and the social partners in designing training and retraining activities as part of programmes to compensate for the social costs of adjustment. In circumstances where many new employment opportunities are located in the informal sector, the ILO should assist member States to develop innovative, low-cost training methods for helping informal sector workers to improve their productivity and working conditions. The ILO also should prepare for policy-makers a compendium of approaches to mitigate the social costs of adjustment, particularly for use in countries in transition and in developing countries;

(e) intensify its assistance to policy-makers to improve their capacity to design training activities that are linked to and benefit from general educational programmes. The ILO also should assist the social partners in developing their own capacity to analyse adjustment;

(f) encourage and assist policy-makers to evaluate training needs and plan appropriate responses within a broad educational, economic and social framework;

(g) assist in the organisation of national tripartite conferences to evaluate adjustment programmes with a view to promoting successful responses;

(h) consider organising a follow-up meeting to the High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment held in 1987;

(i) give policy advice to governments, based on in-depth research concerning training and education, in line with the policy priorities identified by the conclusions of this Committee;

(j) assist member States in examining means to ensure equal access to education and training for all groups of the population.

41. In respect of national capacities to implement human resources development programmes

(a) intensify its technical cooperation programmes with developing countries and with countries shifting from centrally planned to more market-oriented economies. These technical cooperation activities normally should be managed by national organisations rather than donors and should draw on national expertise, including employers' and workers' organisations, so as to ensure enhanced national capacity and not merely the achievement of relatively narrow project objectives. In implementing technical cooperation activities, emphasis should be put on the promotion of international labour standards, tripartite cooperation, collective bargaining and safety and health in the workplace;

(b) give priority to strengthening the capacity of employers, especially in small and medium firms, to design and implement training programmes that increase the productivity of their enterprises and contribute to the personal development of their employees, particularly where such programmes are based on a strong collaborative partnership between employers and trade unions;

(c) collaborate with member States in developing guidelines, procedures and training materials that increase opportunities for productive and freely chosen self-employment and that raise the productivity of workers, especially those working in the informal sector, leading to improved wages, living and working conditions;

(d) develop a programme for promoting partnerships between education and training institutions and the social partners. This programme would, in particular, endeavour to link employers' and workers' organisations, where they exist, with such institutions in jointly developing and implementing training programmes;

(e) encourage and promote developed and developing country dialogue leading to closer cooperation, the development of the interchange of information, the transfer of technology, the provision of training programmes and skills, and the analysis of markets on a continuing basis, leading to closer forms of partnership.

42. In respect of research and information dissemination

(a) undertake applied and practical research that will assist countries to develop appropriate human resources development responses to the challenges posed by structural adjustment. For example, the ILO should compile and publicise information on the impact of various structural adjustment policies on national populations, workers, and vulnerable social groups. Secondly, given the widespread interest in finding the most effective means of encouraging employers to provide training, the ILO should conduct a comparative study of the costs and benefits of different approaches, including tax rebates, enterprise-based training levies and the channelling of public funds for training through accountable bodies in which the social partners are represented. The study should provide countries with practical means of assessing the effectiveness and relevance of these different approaches to their own particular national circumstances, and guidelines for their implementation;

(b) strengthen the capabilities of national statistical offices, national training authorities, individual training institutions and enterprises to collect and analyse data on the demand and supply of training, including training for informal sector activities. This information will provide the basis for designing and implementing training policies and programmes in support of formal and informal sector training activities so as to improve the income earning abilities, living and working conditions of producers and workers, including the strengthening and modernisation of traditional apprenticeship training;

(c) reinforce its role as an international clearing-house for the collection, analysis and dissemination of information about training policy developments, institutional reforms in training, including the effects of privatisation of training institutions, incentive systems that encourage private sector training and innovations in extending training to groups that have been particularly hard hit by structural adjustment and have limited access to training. A particularly important objective of the ILO should be to publicise innovative local approaches to human resource development by enterprises, non-governmental and community organisations, employers' organisations and trade unions, as well as activities conducted jointly by the social partners. An important means of strengthening its clearing-house role is through the establishment of networking arrangements with educational and training institutions, especially at the regional level;

(d) prepare and disseminate a synopsis of research findings of national training experiences contained in ILO's publications on training;

(e) undertake a programme of national and regional tripartite workshops and seminars that provide opportunities for the social partners to share their experiences in human development, especially the results of innovative responses to structural adjustment. The International Training Centre of the ILO should play an important role in this area, both in the conduct of such activities, at the Centre or in the regions, and in the preparation of appropriate background and instructional materials;

(f) undertake comparative analytical studies of the institutional framework for training in different countries. These studies should identify different institutional mechanisms and policies that have been employed for adjusting training programmes to meet better enterprises skill demand and the skill needs of the informal sector, while ensuring equity in training. They should also endeavour to identify the technical, managerial and financial means by which traditional apprenticeship training could be strengthened and modernised to meet the skill and development needs of the informal sector. Based on these evaluations effective strategies for undertaking training policy reforms should be developed.

43. In respect of special programmes

(a) exercise vigorously its unique role among international organisations as the advocate of tripartite collaboration and as champion of the most vulnerable social groups. This responsibility is greater today than ever because of the difficult world economic conditions and the necessity for many countries to undergo substantial restructuring of their economies. The ILO must continue to assert its message concerning social equity and the development and efficient utilisation of human resources both in international fora and in its collaborative activities with the Bretton Woods institutions and regional development banks. The ILO should continue to reiterate that structural adjustment should emphasise social justice and the sharing of the burdens of adjustment, the improvement in working and living conditions which will result from structural adjustment, and tripartite consultation and cooperation on adjustment to improve the probability of its success;

(b) intensify its efforts to improve opportunities for women to participate on an equal basis in all human resource development and labour market programmes. In addition, it must strengthen technical cooperation programmes that promote the full economic social equality of women and improve the working and living conditions of the poorest groups of women, especially in rural areas, who have not had the opportunity to attend school and who, in addition to family responsibilities, are burdened with heavy work responsibilities outside the home;

(c) reinforce its programmes, consistent with the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), to make sure that disabled persons, one of the most vulnerable social groups, are not unfairly impacted by structural adjustment programmes, reduction in social expenditures and privatisation. The ILO should assist countries moving to more market-oriented economies to develop policies and programmes that demonstrate methods of providing equal opportunities for disabled persons in competitive labour markets;

(d) strengthen the role of the International Training Centre of the ILO, which represents a substantial potential to advance the ILO's efforts in human resources development. The Centre should continue to intensify its programmes aimed at enhancing the capacity of training organisations to develop effective managerial and professional skills, especially through training of senior managers and trainers of trainers. The Centre should also develop innovative, low-cost instructional methods and materials for use in developing and transitional economies. The Centre has a key role to play in the functioning of information networks. Its management training and workers' education programmes should be strengthened.

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the adoption of the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee. These are to be found in Provisional Record Nos. 19 and 26.

I call on the Employers' adviser of Argentina, Employer Vice-Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit to us the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee.

Original – Spanish: Mr. FUNES DE RIOJA (Employers' adviser, Argentina; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, Government delegate, Uruguay, who for urgent reasons has to return to his country, I have the honour to submit the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee.

The third report is reproduced in Provisional Record No. 19 and contains the Committee's decisions on seven objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde, the Employers' delegate of Myanmar, the Workers' delegation of the Republic of Korea, the Workers' delegate of Nepal, the Employers' delegation of Romania, the Workers' delegation of Czechoslovakia and the Workers' delegate of Togo. It also refers to a late objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Myanmar.

The fourth and last report, published in Provisional Record No. 26, contains decisions of the Committee on six objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Japan, the Workers' delegate of Paraguay, the Workers' delegate of Guinea, the Workers' delegation of Sudan, the Workers' delegate of Thailand, the Workers' delegate of Cameroon, as well as on other subjects, in particular the communication by the Employers' Group concerning the travel and subsistance expenses of Employers' delegates and advisers.

The Committee unanimously decided in all these cases not to uphold the objections, but in some cases the Committee makes some comments of particular interest. Thus, for instance, in the case of the Employers' delegate of Myanmar, the Committee observes with regret that, as last year, the Employers' delegate is a public servant and not a genuine employer.

In the case of the Workers' delegate of Paraguay, the Committee deeply regrets that the Government's failure to reply has made it impossible for the Committee to study the objection in keeping with its mandate, defined in article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. The Committee left on record the fact that the objection was not sufficiently documented; for this reason it could come to no other decision.

Finally, in the case of the Workers' delegation of Sudan, the Committee observed that at present, in view of the trade union situation prevailing in the country, as described in the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, it was doubtful that the Workers' delegation of that country was really representative of the workers.

I would like to dwell for a moment on the communication received from the Employers' group, which recalls that certain governments have failed to fulfil their obligations under paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, which requires them to bear travel and subsistence expenses for their delegations. After referring to the limits of its mandate, the Committee expressed the view that the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism to evaluate the extent to which these obligations are respected should be examined by the competent bodies of the ILO.

A perusal of articles 39 to 42 of Provisional Record No. 26 shows how many countries have failed to fulfil either partially or in total their constitutional obligation of paying for travel and subsistence expenses. This is not only an affront to those who fulfil this obligation, but it also undermines tripartism, because it is impossible in these circumstances to guarantee the full participation of the social partners. This situation thus threatens the life of the ILO itself.

I would like to express my special gratitude to the Chairman and Government delegate of Uruguay, Mr. Pérez del Castillo, and the Vice-Chairman Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States. I would like to thank the former for the way in which he led our discussions, and the latter for his spirit of cooperation. For all three of us it was our first experience with the Credentials Committee, but the clarity, the realism and the capacity for dialogue shown by my colleagues and made obvious in our meetings represent the spirit of flexibility of tomorrow's ILO.

I would like to thank the Conference for having allowed us to take part in the work of this Committee which guarantees the tripartite nature of the Conference. I would also like to express my very special gratitude to those who made it possible for the three novices on this job to be able to work successfully. They are Mr. Devlin the Legal Adviser, and Mr. Maupain, Mr. Torres Abreu, Mrs. Doumbia-Henry and Mrs. Zarka. All of them ensured that our deliberations had the necessary technical support and administrative infrastructure.

Since these reports were unanimously adopted by the Credentials Committee, in accordance with article 26, paragraph 5(b) of the Standing Orders, I would like to request the Conference to take note of these reports.

Original – Portugese: The PRESIDENT – Since these two reports were unanimously adopted by the Committee, the Conference is merely requested to take note of them. Before closing this item on our agenda I would like to express our gratitude to the Chairman, to the Vice-Chairmen and to all the members of this Committee for the excellent work they have done.

(The reports are noted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON WORKERS' CLAIMS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

I have pleasure in asking Mrs. Cabrera, Government adviser, Venezuela, Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Varela Traverso, Employers' adviser, Uruguay, Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Lynch, Workers' adviser, United States, Worker Vice-Chairman, and Mrs. Moynihan, Government adviser, Canada, Reporter of the Committee, to come up to the rostrum.

I request Mrs. Moynihan, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Mrs. Moynihan (Government adviser, Canada; Reporter of the Committee on Workers' Claims) – I am pleased to be here today to present the report of the Committee on Workers' Claims on its second discussion of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

The issue before us is an important and timely one for the ILO to address. The economic and social effects of insolvency are often severe for the workers concerned. In its deliberations the Committee on Workers' Claims recognised that workers are more vulnerable than other creditors in an insolvency and that they therefore deserve specific protection. The ILO has dealt with this issue before in the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95). Since that time we have seen some countries extend legal protection to workers' claims other than strictly wages. Others have established guarantee institutions to protect workers' claims and insolvencies.

It was in the light of these developments that this issue was placed on the Conference agenda. The Committee on Workers' Claims met for a second and final time this year to finalise instruments on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. While the Employers' group felt that a Recommendation would be a sufficient response to this issue, the Committee decided to develop a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation and I am happy to report that we were able to conclude this task. The Convention we have drafted is flexible in that it offers member States various options for ratification. A member may chose to implement the Convention standards for protecting workers' claims by means of privilege in insolvency proceedings, that is Part II, or a Member may choose to establish a guarantee institution to protect workers' claims as in Part III, or a Member may choose to ratify both parts. With respect to either privilege or guarantee institution protection the Committee decided that as a minimum standard wages, vacation pay, severance pay and other paid absences must be protected. The Committee decided that to ensure effective protection workers' claims should be given a higher rank of privilege than most other privilege claims and in particular those of the State and the social security system.

The proposed Recommendation offers ideas that Members may wish to keep in mind when they review their insolvency legislation. It suggests, for example, other elements of the compensation package which might be protected. It outlines how to protect workers' claims when insolvent businesses are still operating and it provides guidelines for guarding the organisation and financing of guarantee institutions.

I am happy to inform the Conference that the work of the Committee on Workers' Claims was carried out in a true spirit of tripartism, respect and cooperation. Despite the number of conflicting amendments there was a real effort to find consensus among Governments, Employers and Workers or at the very least to avoid lengthy votes where the outcome was already known. While the instruments we have shaped may not be what any one of us would have drafted alone, they do represent the Committee's tripartite discussions, negotiations and compromises.

In closing, I am pleased to table this report and to submit for the Conference's consideration this proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

Original – Spanish: Mr. VARELA TRAVERSO Employers' adviser, Uruguay; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Workers' Claims) – Please allow me to congratulate the President on his appointment and the way in which he has guided the deliberations of this Session of the Conference.

The texts before us are subject to certain reservations by the Employers' group, both in the text and the method of drafting.

The proposed Convention is modern in its content and up to a point flexible. The guarantee institutions, or insurance companies, to cover the workers' claims is a new concept which is applied in certain countries of the world and whose example the ILO wishes to spread; and it is flexible because it consists of two parts, which can be ratified together or separately.

The text, as such, merits some criticism. A great deal of emphasis has been laid on the need for the word "employer" to replace the word "enterprise" when we are talking about the acts against which the workers may raise a claim. The governments will take note that for this change, special national legislation is necessary, establishing the scope of the responsibility to protect the employer against claims wherever there is an employment relationship, such as domestic service, small rural proprietors, small crafts enterprises, small family enterprises, and micro-enterprises.

The text also contains a conceptual error by extending the privilege to claims for the termination of employment. This concept is resisted by numerous legislations, and it will be difficult to obtain ratification in those countries because this concept is repeated in both parts of the Convention, Article 6 and Article 2.

Now, whilst this mention of guarantee institutions is new, this concept is not given enough consideration, because on the basis of Article 8, deliberately these institutions are placed after the State and social security. This idea did not come from the Employers. The Employers wish these institutions to be financially and economically solid, so that in subrogating the worker whose claims they are dealing with they may turn against the insolvent enterprise and try to salvage something. It was the vote of the Governments and Workers which opposed this.

A long discussion also occurred concerning Article 10, when we, the Employers, said that the government would have to adopt measures in order to avoid misuse in these institutions. The vote against by Governments and Workers maintained the present text which says that a government "may" adopt measures. The governments should take note of the fact that they do not have to take such measures, by which the road toward misuse is open with the approval of this Convention.

In our view many of these adverse affects could have been avoided if there had been more spirit of compromise in the room. The block vote by a group of countries with highly advanced legislation in this field, added to that of the Workers, frequently determined the result of the vote.

Our first words in the committee room said that a document adopted with the consensus of all those present would be more forceful than those imposed through a vote. Unfortunately the latter situation became evident during a study of the Recommendation.

We have great objections to this proposed Recommendation. It has the defects of bad Recommendations. It is so ambitious that it goes beyond reality, generous to unsuspected extremes, and repeats concepts which are already contained in the Convention sometimes, confused with regard to some aspects and going into excessive detail in others.

It is rather remarkable that this document, the first after the fall of socialism, should be as demanding, detailed and interventionist as in the socialist world it has left behind. This Organisation deserved a more up-to-date instrument in order to say that it is keeping up with the times. However, we are sad to note that the text is more rigid, which requires more legislation, which is more interventionist, where there is confusion between privilege and the guarantee institution, as these were similar institutions with similar behaviour and similar consequences.

The Committee through its approval implies that it did not understand the difference between these two concepts, that the privilege does not make it certain that it will be possible to obtain these claims, while the guarantee institution does, and that it is logical that what is most uncertain covers the largest number of situations than the other side, which is certain. Privilege is something intangible, whilst a guarantee institution is a real entity with operating expenses and budget, and so on, and for this reason it is necessary to be careful with the claims which will need to be attended to.

This does not mean that acquired rights of workers are refused, but that reality demands striking a balance between what is desirable and what can be given.

The majority of the Committee dealt with this subject with a certain degree of frivolity. It took as a basis the most advanced legislations without thinking about other countries and other social realities.

It was sufficient for one country alone, one country, among move than 150 Members of this Organisation, to recognise that in its legislation these guarantee institutions transferred social security for back payments, for this Committee to adopt this idea and include it in the text.

The legislation of one single European country, therefore, turns into a universal example. This is something which renders the documents less valuable.

We Employers do not feel that we are authors of this Recommendation. We presented 31 amendments: only four of these were adopted. At this stage in our discussions the balance of forces was obvious and the spirit of compromise had disappeared from the room.

So the text approved is a shambles; it establishes rights (of information and consultation), super-privileges (procedures for prompt payment), and will certainly establish a conflict between national legislations concerning bankruptcy.

This sophisticated approximation to the subject of the world of work will not do the Organisation much good. It places it to near to central counties and will establish a distance between the Organisation and the rest of the world.

What developing country can take this text to seek inspiration for its own legislation? Its application would have repercussions on investment and on the creation of enterprises, as well as on the level of employment.

This utopian way of making legislation increases the gap which the ILO claims to bridge and leads us to think that resources devoted to the creation of standards, which later are not applied, could be devoted to activities to help develop entrepreneurship and create enterprises, which is, when all is said and done, where employment is created.

The texts presented, in spite of what they say in their preamble, are not designed to regenerate enterprises. More thought should have been given to this fact.

We cannot guess what the future holds. We do not know how many Members will ratify this Convention, when they will do it, nor in what part of the world this will be done. But we do know that ratification does not equal application, or at least the correct application of a Convention. The Committee of Experts has experience of this.

These texts were drafted, violating article 19, paragraph 3, of the Constitution of the ILO. The voices of governments of the developing countries were not heard sufficiently, nor were their difficulties mentioned in maintaining an investment flow to strengthen their employment and growth. Nor was there any mention of the difficulties they have to bear in view of their structural readjustment, integration into subregional markets or opening their markets to the world. Silence met the arrival of these countries in the Committee, depriving them of a debate which should have been much more fruitful, profound and honest, and which would have given these documents a universal basis, less European-oriented, in view of the excessive weight of the European Community in the discussions.

Please allow me to close my statement by expressing our gratitude to the staff of the International Labour Office for their objective support and their professional attitude; to the staff of the Secretariat, to Mr. Lynch, for the numerous times when he personally tried to find a closer approach between the ideas of these two groups, and to the Chairperson for the efficient way in which she led our discussions.

Mr. LYNCH (Workers, adviser, United States; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Workers' Claims) – I wish to congratulate the President and his staff for the excellent way in which they have conducted this Conference.

After two discussions, the Committee on Workers' Claims has produced a proposed Convention and a Recommendation ready for adoption by this Conference. The proposed instruments are ready, realistic, ratifiable and right. They are in the finest tradition of the ILO and carefully blend what is practised with what is possible.

The Committee kept to its mandate from the Governing Body. The Workers' group, impressing its demand for greater protection of workers' claims, gave the greatest weight to producing a ratifiable Convention. We joined with the Governments in setting a realistic, practical atmosphere for the deliberations.

We feel that this spirit was also reluctantly embraced by the Employers, under the able leadership of Mr. Varela Traverso. The high quality of the deliberations of the Committee and the expertise of our Chairperson, Mrs. Cabrera, made our success possible. Years of excellent preparatory work and activities conducted by the Office, since the issue was first brought to the ILO's attention in 1974, and the outstanding efforts by the Office (in particular, those of Mr. Simpson, Mr. Yemin and Mr. Bronstein) and the Labour Law and Labour Relations Branch make the proposed instruments suitable for adoption by this Conference.

These instruments address the core element and the relationship between employer and worker, which is the right of the worker to receive what is due for the purpose of the ILO. These instruments constitute an improvement and fill a gap in one of the most basic ILO Conventions – the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95).

Article 11 of that Convention provides that workers should be "treated as privileged creditors" with respect to the wage due to them when their employer becomes insolvent. But, in the 43 years since its adoption, the inadequacies of Article 11 became increasingly evident, and the protection it affords workers is not for the world as it is today. Article 11 applied only to wages. The proposed Convention applies to other forms of vital compensation such as severance pay, holiday pay, bonuses and commissions. Article 11 did not provide for wages that became due after the insolvency of the employer. The proposed Convention does and this is important because today the insolvency of a business does not necessarily mean its closure or liquidation, but sometimes its reorganisation and rehabilitation. Article 11 did not provide for the information and consultation of workers and their organisations in insolvency proceedings. This is as necessary to the successful rehabilitation of enterprises as it is to the concept of fairness and justice. The proposed Recommendation provides for this. Article 11 allowed for national law to limit the amount of a claim. The proposed Convention provides that this can be done only at a socially acceptable level and only when adjusted to maintain its value. Article 11 made no provision for the rapid payment of workers. Insolvency procedures are too long for workers' urgent needs. The proposed Recommendation points the way for governments to overcome this unfair burden placed on workers. Article 11 required some form of judicial proceedings which is of no value when there are no assets left. The proposed Convention and Recommendation take into account an improved and expanded definition of insolvency necessary to provide workers' protection. Article 11 made no reference to, and set no standards for, wage guarantee institutions, which had not been developed at the time Convention 95 was adopted. The proposed Convention sets these standards. Moreover, the proposed Recommendation informs governments that when properly constructed, these guarantee institutions can provide better protection for workers' claims.

Finally, and most importantly, Article 11 provided no safeguards in the way national law may rank the privileged claims of workers with respect to other privileged claims. As the Office so correctly noted in its background Report V(1): "If the claims of the State or the social security system are ranked higher than those of workers, any privilege granted to the latter is mere window-dressing."

The proposed Convention (through its Article 8) is no window-dressing; it is the right thing to do and the right time to do it. By requiring that workers' claims be given a higher rank of privilege than those of the State and of the social security system, and by recognising wage guarantee institutions as another means by which workers' claims could be protected, this instrument firmly establishes that governments must assume a greater share of the burden now so unfairly carried by workers when their employers become insolvent.

This is an important message for today and tomorrow. It is a message that we have seen nightly on television this month in the Maxwell case. The number of bankruptcies and the extent of their devastating consequences is increasing.

The world of today is the internationalisation of the world economy and its related structural changes. International competition for investment affects the ability and willingness of governments to cope with the increasingly severe consequences of bankruptcy. The practice of reducing the risk of capital by increasing the risk to workers, which is what secured assets do, cannot be expected to change much. The danger is that insolvency may cease to be a way to end businesses and become another way to do business.

The proposed Convention and Recommendation concern what is considered to be a natural aspect of market economies. In view of the difficulties that the Central and Eastern European countries face in making the transition to a market economy, and in view of the severe challenges the new world economy has placed on developing countries and their societies, the basic idea behind the proposed Convention, i.e. the recognition of the necessity and legitimate role of responsible governments in market economies, is more than timely – is is utterly needed.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. CABRERA (Government adviser, Venezuela; Chairman of the Committee on Workers' Claims) – Although we are now in the final stages of this session of the Conference, this is the first time I have had a chance to address the plenary. Even it is somewhat late in the day, I would like to add my voice to all the previous speakers and express to the President my warm congratulations for his election and the excellent way in which he has guided the work of this Session. I would also congratulate the three Vice-Presidents.

Venezuela had the honour of chairing the work of the Committee on Workers' Claims at the first discussion in 1991, as well as at the second discussion this year. This was a responsibility we accepted, knowing full well that our task would be a difficult one. We had been asked to improve the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), and its provisions concerning wage protection in the event of the bankruptcy or forced liquidation of an enterprise.

When we started the work of the Committee on Workers' Claims at the first discussion of 1991, the Chairman of that Committee, my compatriot, Enrique Marín Quijada recalled that there were many people who considered that the time had come to go beyond the provisions of the Convention of 1949 regarding the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer. But he also emphasised that the Conference had to draft texts which could be useful to all the member States of the ILO. For this reason it was necessary to draw up standards which would constitute progress in comparison with the 1949 Convention, but which would also be realistic, flexibility, and balanced.

It is my great pleasure to announce that after two years' work we have concluded our task very satisfactorily and we are now in a position to submit to this plenary a proposed Convention which I consider a model of progress and at the same time a model of realism, flexibility, caution and balance.

We had been asked to draw up a flexible instrument, and we have done so. We are proposing a Convention which consists of two Parts which are applicable separately. One part protects the workers' claims through the traditional institution of privilege; the other protects workers' claims through the modern institution of a guarantee institution. Any member State ratifying the Convention will be free to choose, in the light of its economic and social conditions, whether it will protect workers' claims in keeping with the Part of the Convention which establishes a privilege, or in keeping with the Part of the Convention which establish a guarantee institution. It may also decide to protect workers' claims both through a privilege and a guarantee institution. Moreover, and here again we laid the stress on flexibility and realism, a member State which has chosen to protect workers' claims through a privilege and a guarantee institution shall enjoy the right to establish the guarantee institution progressively.

We had been asked, as far as privilege is concerned, to draw up a more effective instrument than the 1949 Convention. We have done so. The Convention we are proposing to you establishes the obligation of protecting through a privilege not only the wages of the last three months, but also the remuneration in respect of holiday pay and severance pay. The Convention furthermore states that workers' claims should enjoy a privilege of a higher rank than that of the State unless the workers' credits are also guaranteed by a guarantee institution.

We were asked to be innovative and we have been so. The Convention included the most modern trends in the field, such as the possibility of protecting workers' claims through a guarantee institution. Moreover, the Convention leaves all doors open, including recourse to private insurance, to guarantee the payment of outstanding workers' claims which have been incurred due to the insolvency of the employer.

We were asked to be realistic. We have been realistic. We would have liked the guarantee institutions to ensure the payment of all outstanding workers' claims due to the insolvency of the employer. However, we were concerned by the cost which this would mean for these guarantee institutions. For this reason the protection which the Convention offers through the guarantee institution is somewhat less generous than the protection through a privilege.

We were asked to be balanced and we have been balanced. The proposed Convention makes it possible for workers' claims protected through a privilege to be limited up to a certain sum. We believed with this provision that we would be safeguarding the interests of other creditors, in addition to the workers, who might be prejudiced by the insolvency of the employers. However, in order to ensure that workers' claims are not excessively limited, the Convention states that the minimum amount of the sums protected by the privilege, as well as by a guarantee institution, shall not be below a socially acceptable level and shall, furthermore, be adjusted as necessary in order to maintain its value.

The Committee had a very difficult task to perform. However, I would like to stress that at all times it worked within a constructive spirit and, I would like to stress this, in a spirit of friendship and even complicity. Each one of us felt responsible for offering the workers of the world an international instrument worthy of the ILO.

The results show that we have been successful in this endeavour. We have been able to achieve this due to the excellent disposition of all the members of the Committee, and first and foremost to the personal qualities of our two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Varela Traverso and Mr. Lynch, to whom I would like to express my very deep gratitude. I am also grateful for the valuable help of the Secretariat of the Office, headed by Mr. Simpson, Mr. Yemin and Mr. Bronstein.

We have achieved the results I am proud to present to this Conference. The plenary has before it the report of our work, which I invite the Conference to adopt, and a Convention and a Recommendation which I invite you to adopt in the vote which will take place tomorrow.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I now open the general discussion on the report of this Committee.

Mr. CHIWESHE (Employers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – I should like, first of all, to thank Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues for accepting my request to take the floor; since this is the first time that I have had the opportunity to speak I also wish to congratulate him on his being elected to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. Those who spoke at the beginning and during the Conference wished him luck and success in the daunting task that had fallen on his shoulders. I am more fortunate than they were in that I and the whole membership of the Conference now know that he has distinguished himself in carrying out his duties and has brought the proceedings of the Conference to a happy and successful conclusion. I congratulate him.

I stand to speak on behalf of the African Employers' delegates of the Committee on Workers' Claims. These delegates have found it fit and proper that their concern about the attitude of some Government delegates from developed countries in the tripartite deliberations be very strongly voiced in this august assembly. Let me, from the outset, categorically state that we are not in any way averse to the implementation and, once implemented, to the maintenance of instruments that set high standards of employer-worker relations. We believe in the fundamental rights of the workers to an equitable share of the returns of the business by way of wages and other emoluments both during the time the business is solvent and running financially viable and in the event of its insolvency.

Africa today is afflicted by economic ills whose magnitude is beyond human imagination. In a desperate attempt to rid itself of these ills, almost every African country has embarked in one form or another on a programme of economic recovery. The majority of the economic recovery programmes are foreign-designed and some of those who have designed these programmes insist, before participating in their implementation, upon certain stringent conditions which are very difficult to fulfil and whose purposes at some times we suspect. Be that as it may, Africa greatly needs their participation via investment and is therefore to make do the best it can with these conditionalities.

Africa is, as the whole world, going through a phase of economic development which recognises the legitimacy and indeed the desirability of the private sector as a vehicle of socio-economic development. In our part of the world, the private sector is on the threshold of finding a foothold and for it to succeed we need a massive infusion of private investment – both domestic and foreign. This investment can only come to the continent if, among other things, labour relations are such that they allow for a suitable environment for investment. It is the kind of environment that we believe should be created by the provisions of a Convention which has been the subject of fair, accommodating negotiations by the tripartite partners.

Let me, once again, on behalf of my colleagues, reaffirm our unwavering support for the principle of tripartism as enshrined in the instruments of the ILO. It is our considered view that this principle was grossly disregarded by the representatives of the member governments of the European Community. We believe they negotiated in bad faith, were contemptuous of our views – not only those of Employers but those of other Government representatives. Once they had formed their opinion, it became fixed and sacrosanct and had to be pushed down the throats of other members of the Committee. Be it recorded that the African Employer members of the Committee absolutely resented that posture. With the collapse of the Eastern bloc and the emergence of democracies, we genuinely believed ideological blocs were now history for posterity. We pray we are not proved wrong.

Is this not the right time for the Africans to wish aloud that the day will come when the European Community member States become one political entity with one government – and that it might send one Government delegate, one Employer delegate and one Worker delegate to International Labour Conferences?

Before I leave the podium, it would be remiss of me if I did not, on my own behalf, on behalf of the African Employer members and indeed on behalf of the totality of the Employer membership of the Committee, thank our Vice-Chairman, Mr. Varela Traverso, for a job sterlingly performed under the most trying circumstances. My special thanks also go to that charming and gracious lady, Mrs. Jutta Ulbricht, who was Mr. Varela Traverso's assistant, for the way she helped him guide the Committee to a successful conclusion of its work.

Mr. BURGE (Employers' adviser, United States) – I come before this distinguished body as the representative of the United States employers. United States Employers continue to oppose the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), already provides realistic protection of workers in such circumstances.

Moreover, providing for expanded employees' privileges in addition to wages in a new ILO Convention impairs the goal of bankruptcy law to facilitate the reorganisation of financially distressed companies. The ability of financially distressed companies to reorganise, and make a fresh start, serves the long-term interest of employers, employees, unions, creditors, customers, vendors and society in terms of labour market, stability and job creation. The alternative solution of guarantee institutions provided for under Part III of the Convention penalises successful companies and diverts funds that could otherwise be used for capital investment and the creation of jobs. Instead of creating rigid standards that discourage investment and the creation of jobs, the ILO should be focusing its resources on assisting member States to develop healthy growing economies that will provide job opportunities and an improved standard of living for workers and employers alike.

The proposed Convention and the Recommendation are far too extensive, thus giving guidance to member States that is counter-productive to investment, economic growth and the creation of jobs. The United States Employers will vote "no" on the adoption of the Convention and will vote "no" on the adoption of the Recommendation.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ARBELOA (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) – First of all I would like to say that Venezuela is one of the founding members of the ILO. Venezuelan employers, represented by the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Manufacturers' Associations (FEDECAMARAS), have always recognised the extraordinary work carried out by this unique tripartite international organisation to improve the condition of workers, and the constructive relations between the social partners by way of effective tripartism.

In this regard the employers of Venezuela have been in complete agreement with the letter and the spirit of the Report of the Director-General submitted to the Conference entitled Democratisation and the ILO. However, at this time, in spite of the above, I would like to place on record that we, the employers of Venezuela, are not in agreement with the instruments proposed by this Committee, due to the fact that they will have a tendency to promote additional and unjustified rigidity in labour relations, and inappropriate and inopportune legislation in view of the difficulties which exist in many countries, particularly in the developing countries. There would be State intervention, when what is really needed is more direct contact between the parties themselves. The presence and the increase of such factors, particularly in developing countries such as Venezuela where experience has shown very clearly that legislation has had widely-felt, negative repercussions on recent ILO instruments, would unfortunately turn this Convention and this Recommendation into new and dangerous obstacles to the implementation of the urgent structural adjustment measures we need.

This in turn would be a disincentive to the advancement and development of small and medium-sized enterprises and to productive employment, all of which would undermine the consolidation and democracy to which the Director-General refers so rightly as being one of the principal objectives of the ILO today.

Furthermore, the third paragraph of the Preamble to the proposed Convention and Recommendation outlines as the justification for these instruments that, and I quote, greater value has been placed on the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and that, because of the social and economic consequences of insolvency, efforts should be made where possible to rehabilitate enterprises and safeguard employment. Frankly, I do not really understand how such a positive, constructive and stimulating Preamble could have led to a Convention and a Recommendation of the kind we now have before us for approval.

For all the reasons that I have briefly outlined, my delegation feels obliged to vote against the two instruments. Thank you for placing these remarks on record.

Mr. ERLENBORN (Government adviser, United States) – The Conference Committee which has been considering the instrument concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer has concluded its work and has filed its report accompanied by a proposed Convention and Recommendation.

I compliment the Committee and its leadership on the expeditious manner in which the Committee has treated this subject and on the quality of the work. The Committee considered two forms of protection of claims. One is the granting of a privilege for such claims in insolvency proceeding – the other is the creation of an institution to guarantee such claims. The course the Committee is recommending is the adoption of a Convention with minimum standards for both the privilege and the guarantee, each in a separate part.

A member State ratifying the Convention will be allowed to specify in a declaration whether it accepts the obligations of one or the other part or both. A Member which initially accepts the obligations of one part may thereafter extend its acceptance to the other part.

The terms of the proposed Convention as developed by the Committee in the first discussion last year were reasonable and generally in conformity with the law and practice in the United States relative to a privilege for workers' claims in insolvency proceedings. As the Convention retained those provisions, the Government of the United States could have considered the Convention for ratification.

However, in adopting amendments during this year's consideration, the claims subject to a privilege were extended with respect to holiday pay and severance pay was added. This may prove to be a difficult impediment to United States consideration of ratification. Although laws in the United States exist with respect to insolvency at the national level for most enterprises, certain branches of economic activity are treated separately.

Insurance company insolvencies are conducted pursant to the laws of the individual states. State-chartered financial institutions which are not insured by a federal instrumentality come within the purview of state laws regulating insolvency proceedings. Federally-insured financial institutions' insolvencies are managed pursuant to separate national laws. Adjusting all of these laws to bring them in conformity with the requirements of the Convention would be difficult. However, Article 4, paragraph 2, may allow those categories to be excluded from the scope the Convention.

We believe that the provisions of the proposed Convention extending a privilege for claims to holiday pay, earned over a period that could be as long as two years, will be a deterrent to the adoption of the Convention. The addition of severance pay as a privilege claim presents a similar problem. The proposed Convention taken as a whole embodies principles which, if adopted, would extend better protection for workers' claims. Thus, it can be a valuable guide for action by member States. The proposed Recommendation, however, contains a list of claims for the privilege and guarantees that is so extensive and unrestricted that it is not likely to encourage improvements in the protection of workers' claims. Had the Committee been more restrained and realistic in developing the terms of the Recommendation, there would be a better possibility of their leading to greater protection for workers' claims.

In summary, with reservations as to a few provisions, we believe that the proposed Convention is an excellent instrument. Its adoption by the Conference will serve to advance workers' rights. The Recommendation could have provided concepts for expanding those workers' rights in some member States if they had been more realistic. I again compliment the Committee, which has acted expeditiously and with respect for all the views that were expressed. The secretariat of the Committee was most professional, able and helpful to the Committee members.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE PREVENTION OF INDUSTRIAL DISASTERS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the third item on the agenda which is the examination and adoption of the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters.

I have pleasure in inviting to the rostrum Mr. Simanjuntak, Government delegate, Indonesia, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Hyder, Employers' adviser, Bangladesh, Employer Vice-Chairman; Mr. Aro, Workers' adviser, Finland, Worker Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Seymour, Government adviser, United States, Reporter of the Committee.

I call on Mr. Seymour, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. SEYMOUR (Government adviser, United States; Reporter of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters) – First of all I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his unanimous election and his able leadership of this important session of the Conference.

This morning I am pleased to submit to the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters. The report, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 24*, covers the proceedings of the meetings which, on the basis of a first discussion, have led to conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation.

The report also contains the text of a resolution requesting that an item entitled "Prevention of major industrial accidents" be placed on the agenda of the next session of the Conference. There has been a change in the title so as to permit it more properly to reflect the terms in the conclusions. However, the subjects to be addressed are the same.

Our Committee held 17 sittings, and examined 177 amendments. Many of these amendments required long hours of deliberations, careful analysis and the establishment of several working groups, and had far-reaching effects on the final text. I must stress, however, that the discussion in the Committee clearly demonstrated a spirit of shared concern for the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of major industrial accidents. As a result, the Committee was able to arrive at a consensus or an acceptable compromise on a vast majority of the issues.

Our task in the Committee was facilitated by previous ILO action, including the Conventions and Recommendations lilsted in the Preamble to the proposed conclusions, and the code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents.

The first section of the proposed conclusion deals with the definitions and scope of the conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention. It refers to the need for exclusion of nuclear installations (other than those systems which do not contain radioactive materials), military installations and transport outside installation sites other than by pipeline from the application of the Convention, and also mentions the need to allow progressive implementation. The terms "hazardous substances", "major accident", "major hazard installation", "threshold quantity", "safety report" and "near-miss" have been defined for the purposes of the Convention.

The section entitled "General principles" calls for the formulation, implementation and periodical review of a coherent national policy for the protection of workers against the risk of major hazard installation, with due consideration for their effects on the environment and the public. It also provides for the establishment of a system for the identification of major hazard installations. This list is to consist of categories of hazardous substances or a list of hazardous substances or both, accompanied by their threshold quantities.

Another section, entitled "Responsibilities of employers", contains principles for the identification of major hazard installations, arrangements to be made at the level of the installations, the development of on-site emergency plans, notification of the competent authorities of such installations, major accident reporting, and the preparation and updating of a safety report.

The next section is entitled "Responsibilities of competent authorities". It provides for coverage of the need to ensure arrangements for the preparation of emergency plans outside the site, and to provide information to the public which may be affected. The section also covers the siting of major hazard installations and the inspection of such installations, and it underlines how important it is for the competent authority to have qualified staff and to ensure that they are properly trained.

The next section refers to the responsibilities of workers and their representatives. There is a section addressing the responsibility of exporting States, followed by a Recommendation.

The conclusions proposed with a view to a Recommendation provide that the ILO, in cooperation with other relevant international and intergovernmental organisations, should arrange for an international exchange of information on major accidents, including lessons learned from near-misses and good safety practices. They also provide that the implementation of the provisions in the Convention should, as appropriate, be guided by the ILO code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents, published in 1991, and on the future, updated versions of this code. Although a large number of amendments placed a heavy burden on our Committee, our deliberations on our activities were greatly facilitated by the able guidance and humour of our Chairman, Dr. Simanjuntak. Thanks to him the final conclusions were accepted in a spirit of cooperation.

Our equally able Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Hyder for the Employers' group, and Mr. Aro for the Workers' group, in addition to being professionals, shared a strong sense of concern and responsibility for the prevention of major industrial accidents.They shared a tolerance for the ideas of others, and also demonstrated creativity in the development of solutions to key issues. The delegates who considered 177 amendments in the development of this report are also to be commended. On several occasions a working group was formulated to facilitate progress on the examination of proposed conclusions.

In addition, I would like to acknowledge the work of those who served on the Drafting Committee.They have all earned a well-deserved word of thanks.

Last but not least, I would like to express the gratitude of our Committee members for the excellent help and assistance we received at all times from the representative of the Secretary-General, Dr. Kogi, and his team of experts, secretaries, translators, clerks, typists and all others who so ably carried out their tasks and were available at all times to respond to our wishes with humour and efficiency. In my opinion, their hard work helped bring the activities of our Committee to a very successful conclusion.

In summary, it gives me great pleasure to submit the report of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters and the resolution to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to recommend their adoption.

Original – Portuguese – The PRESIDENT – The general discussion on the report is now open.

Mr. HYDER (Employers' adviser, Bangladesh; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters) – On behalf of the Employers' group of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters, I endorse the Committee's report and also support the adoption of a resolution by the Conference to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session an item entitled "Prevention of major industrial accidents" for a second discussion, with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

In doing so, may I express the hope of the Employers' group of the Committee that by next year it will be possible to re-examine the issues still blocking agreement. It is our hope that the proposed Convention will be flexible enough to accommodate the different systems for the prevention of major industrial disasters, thereby making it ratifiable by the maximum number of member States of this august organisation. There are still crucial provisions in the proposed instruments which merit serious re-examination from this point of view. On the other hand, any efforts to reopen a discussion on some of the issues covered under the definitions and scope will be counter-productive. The exclusion of transport and nuclear and military installations from the scope of the instrument ought to be upheld next year, as these are already covered by specific controls and regulatory mechanisms of other international organisations. Equally crucial is the exclusion of biological organisms from the definition of hazardous substances used for setting the proper criteria for the evaluation of the hazards, as well as the exclusion of their threshold quantities, which have so far not been determined. All such exclusions, if upheld next year, should encourage ratification.

On the other hand, the fact that the text includes the concept of submitting information on near misses and mentions consultation through cooperative mechanisms has serious adverse implications, and will discourage ratification. The provision in the proposed Recommendation that national laws, regulations and other measures should be guided by the ILO code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents published in 1991, or as revised and updated in accordance with ILO practice, also has serious adverse implications. The ILO code has been published for technical guidance and not as a national policy instrument. Reference to a revised or updated code the text of which is not yet known, is impractical and sets a precedent which might jeopardise publication of similar publications, as employers may not agree to associate themselves with them. Because the code of practice was formulated through a process different from that of the Recommendation, reference to it in the Recommendation should be deleted next year.

In concluding, may I thank the Chairman of the Committee, Dr. Simanjuntak, for his excellent leadership, the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Aro, for the courtesy and cooperation extended to our group, and Dr. Kogi and his team from the Office whose hard work and counsel were of immense help to the Committee's deliberations. We are also thankful to the Reporter, Mr. Seymour, the distinguished Government adviser from the United States, and all members of the Drafting Committee for very hard work done on a very difficult and cumbersome issue.

Mr. ARO (Workers' adviser, Finland; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters) – The conclusions presented here form a good basis for the International Labour Organisation to address the issues involved in the prevention of major industrial accidents, as well as the other two main targets of the future instruments, namely the minimising of the risks of major accidents and the minimising of the effects of such major accidents.

The Workers' group welcomes the conclusions and wishes that they be reaffirmed as a Convention and a Recommendation next year after the final consideration which we all have to undertake. It is important at this moment to remember and highlight the background and development which has led us to this stage.

In 1985, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions presented a proposal for a resolution which was later adopted by the International Labour Conference that year. This was in the wake of the catastrophic accidents in Bhopal and Mexico City. That resolution called upon the ILO to undertake a series of activities aimed at the prevention of similar accidents. Since 1985, the ILO has carried out many activities following the requests in this resolution. There is now a practical manual addressed to the industry. There is a code of practice which was already referred to earlier, and there is expanded technical cooperation with the ILO and the UNEP in what is known as the International Programme on Chemical Safety, which has been extremely useful, as well as the ILO's cooperation with other relevant organisations including the OECD and the European Communities. The last item in that resolution was the drawing-up of international labour standards and this is what we are doing now. So rather than an isolated event, we are forming a strong link in a chain which is an important approach by the ILO in addressing these issues as a whole.

The ILO has a unique role in this for three particular reasons. Firstly, the ILO, of all the organisations dealing with these issues, is a genuinely tripartite body which means that the groups which have the highest interests, which have the most to lose or gain depending on the outcome of activities to prevent industrial disasters, are directly represented here. Secondly, the ILO is truly global in its representativity and has the means to disseminate the information to everybody concerned in all parts of the world. And thirdly – and this is unique – the ILO alone can address the issues of the connection between the workplace and the external environment. This was highlighted in a very good fashion in the Director-General's Report two years ago in 1990 on The environment and the world of work – which still serves as a useful guide to all of us who are active in this field.

The ILO's jurisdiction in this matter is clear and it has to be brought better into focus, and these instruments will go a long way towards that goal. What we have in the conclusions is a global, coherent approach to be followed in minimising the risks of major accidents and minimising their effects.

The conclusions call for a coherent national policy which should, among other things, promote the use of the best available safety technology, which is an extremely important issue. When following the concepts put forth in these instruments a country should also pay attention to the possible transboundary effects of accidents in its own region. At the workplace level there should be a documented system of major hazard control which would comprise various components. It would include, but not be limited to, organisational measures such as attention being paid to hours of work, staffing levels and the use of outside contractors. It should also always involve consultation with workers and their representatives who are affected by the activities of the employer.

The workers and trade unions have taken many initiatives in the field of the prevention of major industrial disasters. This has been acknowledged in the Proposed Conclusions in the form of suggesting rights that workers ought to have in the setting up of these mechanisms and structures. However, there should always be, consultations with workers, their representatives and their organisations, as well as with those of the employers. Cooperative mechanisms should be established, such as safety committees, the use of safety representatives or whatever other means there might be to organise these structures.

The workers should have, according to text of the proposed Convention, the right, when necessary, to leave the dangerous area; and not only that, they should also have the right to take directive action which includes, when necessary, the right to interrupt the process to shut down the plant if an accident is developing.

In the field of the transfer of technology, the Convention calls for the exporting State to make sure that the importing State has information on when a substance, process or technology which is being exported is prohibited in the exporting country. In addressing this task, the Recommendation on the other hand calls on the ILO to establish a system for the exchange of information including information on the prohibitions issued by different member States.

The proposed Recommendation also calls for the code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents published in 1991 to be used as a guide. In its current form or as updated, this is an extremely essential part of the conclusions and should definitely be maintained. I believe it would be wise next year to expand that reference to enumerate at least some of the most potential areas in which the suggestions in the Code of Practice could be incorporated into the Recommandation in their own right.

The Recommendation further calls on multinational enterprises to provide equal safety measures in all of their installations, regardless of where those installations might be.

There are two areas on which we have to concentrate next year. One is that the instruments in their current form place much emphasis on fixed installations and individual substances. And perhaps the discussion we have had on the scope and exclusions from the scope could be better brought into focus if we take as a starting-point the risk itself and not so much its physical or geographical characteristics. This is certainly something that the Workers' group is going to think about before coming back next year. We should take the risk as a starting-point, which will necessarily mean the inclusion in some form at least of transport within the scope of this Convention and Recommendation. We have to focus on the risk and not where it appears.

The second area of concentration for next year is the issue of liability. The responsibility of an employer who runs a chemical installation or other hazardous installations is present and is clear but there needs to be an expansion of the wording through which it is made clear that the "polluter pays" principle is introduced as a general guide-line.

The third item which needs to be addressed, perhaps not in this Convention but in the ILO's work in general, is that of biological hazards. No international labour standards should probably be considered for that purpose.

With these thoughts, I wish to thank our Chairman, Dr. Simanjuntak for the firm and flexible way in which he conducted our sessions, as well as the very diligent, precise and professional work of Mr. Seymour as our Reporter. I want to show appreciation to the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Hyder, for a truly and genuinely good working relationship which evolved in the course of the meeting. I want to congratulate the Director-General and his representative, Dr. Kogi, and Dr. Kogi's staff for the very high quality of the preparatory work and the way in which the meeting was conducted. I thank particularly those who have been active in the Workers' group in their various functions and I specially want to thank the participants from the developing country who made this a truly and genuinely global exercise.

Mr. SIMANJUNTAK (Government delegate, Indonesia) – Chairman of the Committee of the Prevention of Industrial Disasters – As the Chairman of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters and on behalf of all its members, I should like to express our appreciation to the Governing Body and to the International Labour Organisation for the timely decision to place an item on the prevention of industrial disasters on this year's agenda of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. In view of the industrial disasters that have unfortunately occurred in the different parts of the world, the first discussion of this important subject has reaffirmed the urgency of preventive action and the key role that the ILO can play in strengthening the efforts of member States in this area.

I recall the resolution adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1985 – soon after the disaster in Bhopal in December 1984 – concerning the promotion of measures against risks and accidents arising out of the use of dangerous substances and processes in industry. In response to the Resolution, the ILO took a series of actions for the prevention of industrial disasters, including the development of a code of practice on the prevention of major industrial accidents, a training manual on major hazard control and technical cooperation with several member States for the establishment of a national major hazard control system.

I believe that the Organisation has recognised and appreciated the magnitude and complexity of the task for the prevention of industrial disasters and the usefulness of a unified approach that embodies both national and international experiences. During the past few years, several major industrial accidents involving chemical substances have occurred in both industrialised and in industrially developing countries. In other words, there is an urgent need to establish a national system for the prevention of major industrial accidents in all member States where there is a potential for such accidents.

The Committee has, in the last two weeks, thoroughly deliberated on ramifications of the issues associated with the prevention of industrial disasters. In the course of its discussions, the members of the Committee presented and discussed forceful arguments on matters of real substance. As a group made up of a composite of learned experts from different environments, backgrounds and cultures, we were able to achieve our goal within the framework of tripartism and in a spirit of cooperation, good intentions and dialogue. I am happy to report to the Conference that all the points raised in the Committee were made in a constructive spirit of collaboration.

These points and arguments on ways and means of overcoming identifiable problems are clearly expressed in the report of the Committee. It has thus proposed corresponding texts of conclusions as a basis for the second discussion at the next Session of the International Labour Conference, in 1993, with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

It is important to note that these conclusions have been structured so as to provide the much needed flexibility that would enable member States, in ratifying them, to apply appropriate practical measures in accordance with national law and practice.

My task as the Chairman of the Committee would have been impossible to accomplish successfully without the support and cooperation I enjoyed from all the officers and members of the Committee. I should particularly like to thank the Government members, both as individuals and groups, for putting their vast professional knowledge of the subject matter completely at the disposal of the Committee. Many thanks also go to the Vice-Chairmen and the Employer and Worker members of the Committee. The Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Hyder, is a man of innovations and an excellent manager supported by extensive technical expertise – all of which he put forward for the benefit of the Committee. The ever resourceful Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Aro, who has actively participated in a number of ILO activities relating to the prevention of industrial disasters, made many significant contributions to the work of the Committee. He did this by making effective use of the expert knowledge in his group. On several occasions working parties were formed to facilitate the good progress of the work of the Committee. I would also like to thank all the members of the working parties who worked very hard to reach a consensus on matters of common concern to the three groups of the Committee.

I would also like to extend my appreciation to the Reporter of our Committee, Mr. Seymour, for his hard work in the Committee in which he spared no effort in applying his expert knowledge to produce an accurate record of our work. This speech would be incomplete without acknowledging the Secretary-General of the Conference, his representative Dr. Kogi and his team of devoted experts – secretaries, translators, clerks and other support staff. They indeed represent the moving spirit behind whatever may have been achieved since the ILO started a series of actions after the Bhopal disaster.

In conclusion I would like to call on the Conference to approve the report and adopt the Proposed conclusions and a Resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled "Prevention of major industrial accidents". The title of the proposed instruments was also amended from the "prevention of industrial disasters" to the "prevention of major industrial accidents". I am confident that the new instruments will be an important step forward towards the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risks of industrial disasters.

Mr. SCHALLER (Employers' adviser, United States) – The Employers of the United States fully support Mr. Hyder's comments and will work diligently during the next year for an instrument which will provide clear guidance for nations in their quest for the prevention of major industrial accidents.

However, the United State Employers' delegation sees several obstacles to achieving this goal. One of these is an attempt to use this instrument as a forum to advance an industrial relations' agenda which will not contribute to, and indeed may detract from, worker, public and community safety. Another is an effort to introduce concepts which, in our view, have no place in an instrument which is clearly focused on conventional industrial operations – concepts such as extending the scope of the instrument to transportation, nuclear and biological hazards, for which a separate body of regulation and practice is necessary and available in each instance.

The subject of the siting of industrial installations with respect to other industries and residential areas is also of concern. While we acknowledge the need for a siting policy, we believe the distinction between new installations, where physical separation is feasible, and existing installations, where alternative solutions must be found, needs to be clearly addressed in this instrument.

Finally, and perhaps most crucial, is the previously mentioned introduction of the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents into the Recommendation. In the absence of any other substantive guidance, the code of practice is, in fact, the Recommendation.

Even a cursory review of the code reveals that, while quite satisfactory as a source of voluntary guidance, it contains many provisions which would surely be challenged and debated if it had been presented in the form of a Recommendation. To give this code the status of a Recommendation would have a chilling effect on future efforts of tripartite groups of experts who would be obliged to focus not on technical consensus, but on the political and legal implication of every word and phrase, considerations which would compromise the technical value of the document, which some of us technical experts are not prepared to do.

We must not establish this precedent.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' member, France) – I would like to bring to the attention of the Conference Paragraph 29 of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation. This Paragraph, which refers to the ILO Code of Practice on the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents, is, I believe, a dangerous precedent which could give rise to a number of legal and practical problems, both with regard to the future Recommendation, and the ILO code of practice. Let me explain what I mean in a few words.

I do not believe that a link should be established between a Recommendation and a text which has not been adopted by the International Labour Conference – and which, as far as I know, was not even been officially put before the Conference but brought only to the attention of the Committee.

Furthermore, I believe this reference to the ILO code of practice to be a potential source of problems because it is not a final text and may, as stated in paragraph 29, be reviewed, revised and updated in accordance with a procedure which does not involve the Conference. Consequently, the Conference is referring only to a very hypothetical text which might be revised.

I am well aware that a number of editorial precautions have been taken in the wording of paragraph 29, with the use of such expressions as "guided by" and "as appropriate". But the fact remains that when examining the application of this Recommendation, if it is adopted, account will have to be taken of this code of practice.

A Recommendation is of no small importance; may I refer you to Article 19, paragraph 6, of the Constitution, which refers to a number of obligations deriving from Recommendations, including the need to submit a report on law and practice. To what extent will these reports cover the way in which governments in fact were guided by the code of practice? And to what extent will there be a detailed examination of this text, which is very voluminous and very complex.

I also believe that this reference will give rise to problems in connection with the code of practice itself. Indeed, there are other codes of practice and the same problems may arise in the future with regard to these codes; they may also end up being linked to an international labour Recommendation. These ILO codes are adopted according to a simplified procedure by a tripartite committee of experts and then formally adopted by the Governing Body. And the Governing Body certainly does not have the ability to go into the finer points of detail of these codes. The simplified procedure has the advantage of making these codes very flexible – and therefore very useful instruments for the Organisation. But if these codes are to be more or less formally linked to an international labour Recommendation in the future, we might be advised to take a fresh look at the way in which they are drafted – thus making them less flexible. In any case, I believe that the Employer members of the Governing Body will most certainly hesitate before they allow such codes to be adopted by the same simplified procedure as that which is practised at the moment.

I should just like to make a final comment. We tend to underestimate the importance of Recommendations. They tend to be dealt with during the last few hours on the last day of work of a committee – and short cuts are frequently taken. For example, there is a tendency to transfer to a Recommendation provisions which have not been adopted in the Convention or as in this case, to refer to another text. We personally believe that Recommendations are very important texts and they deserve the full attention of the Conference and, consequently, the full attention of the Committees. Therefore they should be prepared with the utmost care. I would like to put these points before the members of the Conference and member States for their consideration between now and the Conference next year.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards: Submission, discussion and adoption Original Portuguese: – The PRESIDENT – The fourth item on our agenda is the consideration and adoption of the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

I would like to request the Officers, Mr. Rood, Government delegate, Netherlands, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Germany, Vice-Chairman; Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium, Vice-Chairman; and Mrs. Montenegro Díaz, Government delegate, Nicaragua, Reporter of the Committee. I request them to be so kind as to come up to the rostrum.

I now call on Mrs. Montenegro Díaz, Reporter of the Committee.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. MONTENEGRO DÍAZ (Government adviser, Nicaragua; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – Having been appointed to the post of reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards, it is my honour to address this plenary to put before you the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Committee was set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference and proceeded to examine the third item on the agenda, "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The report consists of two parts. Part One contains the substance of the general debate on the application of Conventions and Recommendations, and the compliance by member States with their obligations under the Constitution of the ILO and the discussion of the General Survey of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning minimum wages.

Part Two contains a summary of the information supplied by governments, of the Committee's discussions, and of the conclusions adopted by the Committee.

The Committee examined 47 individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions, the fulfilment of the obligation to submit reports in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, and the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities.

The Committee held 22 sittings. The main aspects of the general debate are described in section B, paragraphs 8-87; it focused on the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The Committee, as in previous years, recognised the excellent quality of the report of the Committee of Experts which provides the main basis, in contents and form, for the Committee's discussions. It noted the respect for the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality. Many Government members (in particular, those from developing countries) expressed regret that they had not received the report of the Committee of Experts early enough.

The Committee dealt with the possible reform of the standard-setting system, and concluded that any change should be studied by the supervisory bodies and should not weaken the application of ratified Conventions in law or in fact. Without the supervisory machinery, standard-setting activities would lose their effectiveness.

According to the report of the Committee of Experts, the number of observations received from employers' and workers' organisations reached a record high this year, thus showing the interest they have in the supervision of standards.

The discussion on the role of supervisory bodies is summarised in paragraphs 8-15 of the report.

Another question considered by the Committee was the possibility of setting up a tribunal to solve rapidly any question or difficulty concerning the interpretation of a Convention referred to it by the Governing Body, or under the terms of the Convention, in keeping with article 37, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the ILO.

The representative of the Director-General informed the Committee that the Office would draw up a detailed study and submit it in due course to the competent bodies.

The Committee expressed its satisfaction with the admission of new members to the ILO; this reinforces the universality of international labour standards and strengthens tripartism as a dynamic factor in standard-setting activities.

Some Government, Employer and Worker members attributed special importance to the recent trends in certain countries, in particular as regards the process of transition to a market economy, and to the technical assistance they were receiving from the ILO.

Other subjects covered in the general discussion were: the ratification of Conventions, denunciations, the application of standards in special circumstances, such as export-processing areas, offshore industrial facilities, and as regards safety and health and equal remuneration.

The Committee noted the general observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which requested governments, when reporting on the application of this Convention, to include information on special aspects, such as the existence of machinery for the setlement of collective labour disputes, the right to strike and lockouts.

The Committee also dealt with the application of standards concerning labour inspection, having supported the recommendations that the Committee of Experts had made in this connection.

As for the minimum age for employment, the Committee was concerned with the difficulties of applying standards in this field, in paragraphs 59 to 61 of the report of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee paid special attention to the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). Some members stressed their concern over the large rises in unemployment and their interest in structural readjustment which should be a matter of consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations. Furthermore, they expressed their concern with the precarity of employment spreading to certain parts of the world.

Technical cooperation and standards were discussed at length in the Committee. The representative of the Secretary-General, in his introductory statement to the Committee, stated that the Governing Body supported the Director-General's proposal and encouraged him to continue in his efforts to achieve the greatest possible consistency between technical cooperation and international labour standards. In his opinion it could be stated that there was clear consensus concerning the importance of standards as a concrete expression of the general objectives of the Organisation, excluding any idea of possible conditionality.

The unique character of international labour standards was stressed as an essential point of reference for the technical cooperation activities of the ILO. The Committee congratulated the Office for its assistance to governments through direct contacts, informal consultative missions, training seminars and information to guide them in how to meet their obligations with regard to standards.

Standard-setting activity is the hallmark of the ILO and technical cooperation should be used to ensure better application of international labour standards.

Paragraphs 9 et seq. of the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards sum up the discussion on the reports submitted under article 19 of the Constitution of the ILO and on effect given to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

The general debate on minimum wages is contained in section C, paragraphs 93 to 113 of the report. The Committee notes that methods for fixing minimum wages have always been among the main objectives of the ILO and are covered by international labour standards.

Some members mentioned that the standards for fixing minimum wages were strategic instruments used against poverty and social exclusion. Others considered that minimum wages constituted one of the main aspects of tripartism and free collective bargaining. Some members suggested that the question of the relationship between employment – particularly, the employment of young people and low-skilled workers – and minimum wages should be the subject of an Office study.

In part D of the report ("Compliance with specific obligations") the Committee points out to the Conference information on the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, and reports on ratified Conventions. The Committee insisted on the importance of giving practical information to find out whether a Convention has been applied or not. It also found with satisfaction that progress had been made in certain cases and this was considered as a positive incentive for governments to reply to the comments of the supervisory bodies. They also took note of special cases and noted the number of reports submitted on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations. The Committee regretted that there were a number of countries which, despite repeated invitations, did not attend the discussions concerning their countries.

The Committee on the Application of Standards would like to join with the Committee of Experts to pay tribute to Mr. Sidibé who held the post of Director of the International Labour Standards Department until his retirement in March this year. At the same time we warmly welcomed his successor, Mr. Bartolomés de la Cruz.

With this summary I leave the fate of the Report on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations with the plenary and recommend its approval, because this is one of the essential elements for the success of the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original – German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' adviser, Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – The Reporter has referred to some of the essential parts of the report. Among other things we can see from the report the ever-growing activities of the ILO supervisory machinery. The increasing number of member States is one reason for this. However, the fact that many countries have gone back to democracy and to market economies is a qualitative element which cannot be overestimated.

From time to time it was pointed out in this connection that democracy and a market economy are not the same thing. In our opinion the two live on the basis of the same principles, namely fair competition and freedom of decision of the individual as well as of social groups. It is only in a proper market economy that democracy can live and only the efficiency of a market-economy order provides the basis for social progress. The ILO should take these factors more and more into account when it provides assistance to its Members.

The ILO as a large consulting and services enterprise has to provide support for the democratisation process. At the same time it must realise that without privatisation of enterprises a market economy has no real chance.

The report of our Committee shows that the dialogue this year took place in a reasonable atmosphere. The Committee has found itself, once again, back on the road to reason and discussed controversial subjects in a reasonable manner; this also applies to the relationship between the various supervisory bodies, in particular, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on Standards. The relations show that there is no doubt that each supervisory body has its own responsibilities and tasks without being a subsidiary or a superior of the other.

As regards the main question as to how Conventions and standards are to be important, we can summarise as follows.

First of all, a binding interpretation of the standards can be given only by the International Court of Justice according to the Constitution.

Secondly, our Committee, according to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, examines to what extent the member States have carried out their obligations regarding the application of Conventions, and this in an independent manner, and reports in writing to the Conference.

Thirdly, as regards the carrying-out of its tasks, the Conference Committee makes use of the reports of the Committee of Experts whose views have great weight.

Fourthly, the views of the Committee of Experts, as the Committee of Experts has pointed out quite rightly, are not formally binding on the Conference Committee, as has been clearly proved through an analysis of the legal basis of both Committees. Historical developments have also confirmed this. The relationship between the two supervisory bodies of the ILO, therefore, as the experts have emphasised, must be governed by mutual understanding and cooperation. Therefore, we would be very grateful to the Committee of Experts in the future it they were to introduce this spirit in a more extensive manner in the dialogue on the points on which we most disagree. And these are, as is well known, the very detailed interpretation of the experts on the right to strike which the experts base on Conventions No. 87 or 98. We see no reason for this interpretation if we look at the interpretation yardstick for international instruments, namely the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, to which the experts themselves have referred.

The two instruments, Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, were drawn up at the end of the forties, when there was no consensus on strikes and lockouts which could have been reflected in the text of the instruments. It was only after about a decade, when many States had ratified the instruments, that experts started to provide an interpretation of this right to strike. After many further stages, this led to the very detailed regulations which the experts now use as the only yardstick for the settlement of labour disputes. This is not in conformity with the instruments and is not justified by the agreements that have been made by the two parties. Article 31 of the Vienna Convention is not properly applied because there it is indicated that there should be agreement among the parties regarding the interpretation. The reports of the experts over many years are evidence of the contrary, because these reports show that in the member States of the ILO all kinds of rules apply as regards strikes and lockouts but they do not really correspond to the views of the experts.

Supervision means that there is an obligation to ratify. Therefore, we do not disregard the clear importance of ratification. However, we do not share the rather too-simple formula according to which every ratification is good and any denunciation is bad. If one ratifies a Convention, one has to have the will and be in the position to carry out the obligations assumed. In our Committee, we hear again and again complaints regarding the fact that governments cannot apply the Conventions because of the very high level of obligations, and here we see the importance of supervision and application. We think that member States should think about this in time and should not, for reasons of false prestige, think that they should adopt standards which are too high or too complex. During the past 15 years and more, there has been a trend towards to a drop in ratifications and I think this should be taken as a warning. Furthermore, if outdated Conventions are not revised, denunciations may be unavoidable and particularly in times of change, we have to take note of the signs of the times and to react in time. We consider the worldwide trend towards democracy, pluralism, a market economy and private ownership is not just a temporary phenomenon. It is part of the tradition of the report of the experts and the tradition of the general discussion in the Conference Committee to consider the application of certain Conventions in general. We leave the question open as to whether always the same selection of Conventions is justified if there are no new facts. This, in our opinion, applies this year to the selection regarding labour inspection, the question of the international shipping registers and the application of Conventions in export processing zones. In the report of the Experts on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), there are certain judgements made and there is a trend to a more sober description of the problem. Of course we all see the difficulties that exist when one moves from dictatorship to democracy and a market economy. These difficulties, however, are not an excuse. We would, however, like to give our full support to all measures and concrete activities connected with the protection of children, which were referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts. Here it is a question of the respect of basic human rights through promotional measures and investments in the training and education of young people.

The general survey made by the Committee of Experts, under article 19 of the Constitution, deals with Conventions and Recommendations concerning minimum wages. This is a subject which the ILO has considered from the earliest times because wages are one of the most important factors among working conditions. However, we should also accept that wage fixing ideally should be carried out within the framework of autonomous bargaining. The procedure for wage fixing is necessary when, within the framework of collective bargaining, the proper conditions are not met. Minimum wages and minimum wage fixing are therefore necessary measures in a society which has the right to self-determination. When applying the minimum wage procedure, we should ensure that the specific minimum wage on the one and would makes it possible for a worker to lead a dignified life and, secondly, that the field of application, the concrete wage fixing, does not have any negative effect on free collective bargaining.

The report of the Committee of Experts shows that there is a tendency to link minimum wages with wages established under collective agreements and not to make any distinction. We feel such a tendency, without taking into account qualifications, etc., as being dubious and, according to our conviction and contrary to what the Experts say, we feel that the economic conditions should be fully taken into account when fixing wages. This is not only a result of the clear wording of Convention No. 131 but it is also necessary to maintain jobs. It would be hiding one's head in the sand if the close relationship between the wage and the number of jobs were to be denied. The amount of work available is not something that can be manipulated. Jobs exist only to the extent that there is a demand for products or services and this demand is determined by the price of the service.

The fact that minimum wage fixing is an intervention in free bargaining can be seen from Convention No. 131 itself because, according to Article 2 of the Convention, minimum wages shall have the force of law and only subject to this reservation is the freedom of collective bargaining maintained.

But apart from this abstract aspect it is clearly seen that minimum wages pay an important role in the economy of the country. The influence of the State over working conditions grows, and at the same time, the influence of those involved and concerned is reduced. This is something to which the social partners should not be indifferent.

The report and discussion on minimum wages have shown that the situation in many countries is still very far from ideal. As regard to the main activity of the Committee, that is the examination of practice and the application in various countries of individual Conventions, I would like to refer you to the appendix to the Report. All the main points of the many dialogues with the Governments concerned are reflected in this appendix. Indispensable for any examination by the Experts as well as by the Conference Committee are the reports from the member States and here we must be very concerned, because the number of actual reports has increased and this, of course, leads to the danger that the selection of countries invited to take part in the dialogue may be considered to be more arbitrary.

Furthermore, all the bodies of this supervisory machinery, that is, the Office, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee, has an ever-growing burden. Views were expressed in the Committee that decisive counter measures would have to be taken very soon. In the general debate, among other things, we put forward certain considerations. On this point we hope the Office will review all these points during the course of the year and that it will make a report.

However, we do not want to complain without noting that there have been cases of progress. We have the list of these cases of progress and we are trying to achieve positive changes through our dialogues with the member States. For reasons of time I would refer once again to the voluminous appendix.

The success of the main task of the Committee means that there has to be a minimum of co-operation. We think that all parties have contributed in a positive way. These must be understanding between the workers and employers and we would therefore like to thank in particular the spokesman of the Workers' Group, Mr. Peirens. There was considerable work done, both visible and invisible, by the secretariat under the leadership of Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz. We are ready to place our trust in him as was the case with Mr. Sidibé, who has now retired.

The Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Max Rood, was very efficient and we have great respect for him.

I would also like to thank the Employers' Group which supported me unreservedly.

Original – French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – The most outstanding point remains the persistence of far-reaching change throughout the world, and the consequences which these changes are having on the application of standards. This applies equally to developing countries, the countries which are in transition to a market economy, the countries facing adjustment programmes and industrialised countries alike.

And though once again we were able to rely on the support of the Employer members and the overwhelming majority of governments when it came to supporting the universal application of standards and the effective strengthening of the supervisory machinery, there were none the less some disturbing trends as well. We believe that these are challenges for all of us. Some speakers voiced doubts as to the universal nature of standards, or at least of some standards, and with regard to the principles and methods of the supervisory machinery. This was the case in discussions on several Conventions, such as Conventions Nos. 122, 111 and 98, but above all in our discussions relating to Convention No. 87.

By criticising whenever possible the views held by the Committee of Experts concerning freedom of association, and in particular the right to strike, the Employer members sometimes led our Committee astray in its deliberations. Governments which had cases under examination took advantage of this on several occasions to weaken the impact of the Committee as a whole. This took place even for Conventions other than Convention No. 87. These governments challenged the universality of standards by referring to their countries' social, economic, or political circumstances.

I do not want to overstate these difficulties, but these tactics clearly may weaken the effectiveness of the supervisory machinery. We have also emphasised that the drafting, application and supervision of standards are closely related. Texts which are drafted in too general terms are bound to give rise to problems of interpretation and therefore of supervision. There is also a danger that the complexity of the organisation of work will be given short shrift. We must thus strike a balance between our various objectives.

Doubts were voiced and we faced challenges during our discussions on the principles and working methods of the Committee of Experts. Once again this year, the Workers' group reiterated its support for the principles and methods of work of the Committee of Experts, and supported its views. Governments are not the only participants in the standard-setting machinery of the ILO. This tripartism consequently has repercussions on the drafting, supervision and interpretation of standards. Conventions are not purely government sponsored instruments; they are the fruit of tripartism, their driving force. The views of the Worker members should be credited with the same weight as the views of others when it comes to interpretation of standards.

We also took note of the Experts' suggestion to consider the possibility of creating a special tribunal. If implemented, this would make a useful contribution towards the strengthening of the supervisory machinery. In light of the fact that there has been a useful exchange of comments and constructive suggestions between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards for some years now, our Committee approved a proposal submitted by the Workers' group. In it, the Conference Committee requested the Director-General to ask the Chairman of the Committee of Experts to attend next year's general discussion as an observer.

In our debate, the reporting procedure was challenged and placed in doubt as well. We have noted certain suggestions and indications on the subject of the obligation to submit reports. Several governments pleaded in favour of change, particularly with regard to the frequency of submitting reports, the choice of Conventions and the drafting of the questionnaire, in view of the growing numbers of ratifications and Conventions. We are not a priori against certain alterations provided that the supervisory machinery is not weakened as a result, but rather strengthened as a whole and taking into account the role of every component part.

The Worker members also expressed the wish that the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts be consulted before any decisions are taken on the subject because the reporting system and the individual role played by each body form the basis of our work. The reports, for example, determine the choice and follow-up of individual cases.

We have the impression that the far-reaching changes which are occurring in the world have made the choice of individual cases more complicated rather than simplifying this process. More than ever before it has become indispensable for the ILO and the Committee of Experts to carry out in-depth studies of how Conventions are applied in law and in practice. We also believe that international standards and extensive social dialogue are among the crucial prerequisites for employment policies to be effective and for economic policies to be successful.

We have shown how international standards can constructively contribute to strategies of economic growth. We illustrated this during the discussion of the General Survey of the Reports on the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention (No. 26) and Recommendation (No. 30), 1928; the Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention (No. 99) and Recommendation (No. 89), 1951; and the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention (No. 131) and Recommendation (No. 135), 1970. This survey was very timely given the importance of these instruments in a world which is in the throes of extensive economic and social restructuring. Minimum wages are strategic instruments par excellence in the struggle against social alienation and poverty.

The discussion on the general survey was most constructive. The views of the Committee of Experts and the Conclusions are often very useful in the discussion of individual cases in spite of the fact that this year participants were rather thin on the ground during this discussion.

This is perhaps not altogether surprising because we have noted that our Organisation, the ILO, does not appear to attach very much importance to the general survey. I refer in particular to the general survey carried out last year on human resources development (the Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142). One year ago, we reached some very interesting conclusions, particularly with regard to the role of employers' and workers' organisations. The general study by the Committee of Experts last year was established on the basis of reports sent in by most governments. This year a general discussion was held at the Conference on the very same subject. There was a working document but in it there is no reference whatsoever to last year's general survey, nor indeed to our Committee's conclusions.

The Workers' group remains concerned by the collective denunciation of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). We are not convinced that the prior consultation requirement was always complied with and we have questions with regard to the grounds for denouncing this Convention. Ratification of the additional protocol, however, offers genuine guarantees as to equal treatment and respect for acceptable working conditions. Perhaps the model for social dialogue within the European Community which was instituted on the basis of an agreement concluded between workers' and employers organisations on 31 October 1991 could help to avoid this type of denunciation in the future. We prefer a solution which will both strengthen the commitment of member States towards the ILO and at the same time be conducive to the shaping of a social policy at the level of the European Community.

After the discussion of the general survey we moved on to individual cases, that is to say, those countries in respect of which the Committee of Experts had, in their report, mentioned that there were inadequacies both with regard to laws and regulations in practice.

Because of time pressure we were not able to deal with all of these cases and we hope that, thanks to the report of the Committee of Experts, we will be able to revert to these next year. The cases would be Romania, Bulgaria, Germany and Czechoslovakia with regard to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), Turkey and Indonesia in connection with the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and Japan in connection with the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We had discussions with 34 governments on the subject of a total of 69 cases of non-observance of a particular Convention. We dealt with some 20 different Conventions including Conventions on safety and health, minimum wage fixing, social security, labour inspection, forced labour, equal treatment, free collecitve bargaining and freedom of association.

We noted with satisfaction that there was increased readiness to cooperate with our Committee and the Committee of Experts. We saw that there was a certain amount of progress with regard to law and practice.

However, we are extremely disturbed to see that such progress as there is is frequently limited to just one element or one aspect of a particular comment made by the Committee of Experts. It is therefore necessary to continue to monitor developments very closely with regard to legislation and practice on such aspects that have not been resolved in conformity with international standards. In a large number of cases the Committee has asked for progress to be made before the next session Those countries mainly concerned are Cuba, the United Kingdom, Peru, Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Thailand and United Republic of Tanzania. We shall revert to this question next year.

Our Committee has suggested that ILO technical assistance be made available in particular to Panama for Convention No. 87; Syrian Arab Republic for Convention No. 87; Malaysia for Convention No. 98; Colombia for Convention No. 87; Kuwait for Convention No. 87; Pakistan for Conventions No. 87 and 98; and Thailand for Convention No. 29. We have had to put Sudan into a special paragraph because of the persistence of forced labour (Convention No. 29) and the lack of cooperation on the part of the Sudanese Government with the ILO and our Committee.

We would also like to recall the pledge made by the Government of the United Kingdom to enter into substantive, frank and constructive dialogue with the trade union organisations so that a solution in conformity with Convention No. 87 may be found for the case of the Cheltenham Centre before next year.

To conclude I would like to thank our Chairman, Mr. Max Rood, who guided our discussions in a very skilful way. I would also like to thank the reporter, Mrs. Fanny Montenegro Díaz, the branch staff and the new department director, Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, as well as Mr. Zenger and Mr. Gernigon, and all the members of the Office and the interpreters for their work and their commitment. I would also like to thank the spokesman of the Employers' group from the bottom of my heart for their spirit of dialogue and also the officers of the Workers' group – our friends Messrs. Hickey, Thomas and Ahmed and Mbaye and George Kanaev who will be retiring as well as Coen Damen from the Workers' Relations Branch.

Our report was unanimously approved by the members of the Committee and on behalf of the Workers' group I urge the Conference to adopt it.

Original – Portuguese: – The PRESIDENT – We have heard the submission of the report of this Committee and now we move on to the general discussion.

I have no speakers on the list in the general discussion. I would like to know whether there is anyone who would like to take the floor on this report? If there are no speakers, I shall consider that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: – The PRESIDENT – I would now like to thank very warmly the Chairman of the Committee, the Vice-Chairmen and all the members as well as the secretariat for the excellent work done.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

These bring the total number of ratifications of international labour Conventions to 5,698.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We will now proceed to examine and adopt the report of the Committee on Resolutions. I have pleasure in inviting Mr. Ejalu, Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee; Mr. Castle, Employers' adviser, United Kingdom, Employers' Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland, Workers' Vice-Chairman to come up to the rostrum.

I would request Mr. Ejalu, Chairman and Reporter, kindly to submit the report.

Mr. EJALU (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee) – I have the honour to submit to this plenary sitting of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference the report of the Resolutions Committee, which includes the draft texts of three resolutions adopted unanimously and without vote in the Committee.

The first resolution proposed to you by the committee concerns the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment. It has thus a theme of great importance not only to this Organisation but to the world. Industrialised and developing countries alike are struggling to deal with the scourge of unemployment and there is a rapidly growing recognition of the importance of encouraging and supporting enterpreneurship both as a means of meeting the unemployment challenge and as a way of increasing the natural wealth. The resolution now before you will, if approved, constitute the first official pronouncement of the International Labour Conference on this phenomenon.

The fact that the text of this resolution resulted from the merger of two original resolutions from the Employers and Workers respectively is a guarantee of balance in approach. The fact that the text before you now was adopted without any amendment and unanimously, demonstrates its general acceptability to the membership of this Organisation.

It is perhaps appropriate also to point out – in this year of Olympic Games when new records of athletic prowess will be set – that the Resolutions Committee also set a record this year.

The first resolution before you was adopted in only 39 minutes in the Committee. I think it is appropriate that we ask the plenary to give the resolution a gold medal approval.

The second resolution which I have the honour to submit to you in my capacity as Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, concerns employment promotion as an essential component of overall development. Once again, it touches the theme of alleviation of unemployment but from quite a different perspective, and the Resolutions Committee has been at pains to ensure the complementarity of the two texts.

As we all are aware, there are many facets to development because development is a complex process both to understand and to manage. Past efforts have met with greater or lesser degrees of success in different countries, but experience has shown us that the critical element of development is that it must be an internal process in each country. It cannot be forced or managed by external interventions, as helpful and necessary as this can sometimes be. And for this internal dynamic of development to succeed, it must be based on a broad consensus in the population. In this, as in so many other aspects of development, the International Labour Organisation plays a crucial role because of its unique tripartite structure.

The third and final text submitted to you by the Resolutions Committee concerns the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families. On this subject, as might be expected, a broad range of views was expressed in the Committee and it was clear that the subject-matter was politically sensitive in many countries. All the more credit then to the members of the Committee, that a consensual resolution was drafted and adopted after a calm, resolved and principled debate.

These are the texts before the assembly, and I am sure that under the President's wise guidance they will be adopted.

Before ceding the floor, however, I should wish to take this opportunity to thank most warmly my Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland, and Mr. Castle, Employers' adviser, United Kingdom. If the Resolutions Committee met with such success, it was in the largest measure due to their intelligence, cooperation and hard work. I wish also to thank the Secretary-General of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference for providing the Committee, and especially myself, with such an efficient, competent and devoted secretariat, including the interpreters. The interpreters were able not only to translate from language to language, but also to deal with sentiments.

This was the first time that I have chaired a meeting of a United Nations body and I must confess that without this team of fine people to assist me I would have been a little lost.

Finally, permit me to say that my duties as Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee, which I consider a great honour not only for me personally but for my country, the Republic of Uganda, have brought home to me strikingly how much this great Organisation, for all its age and tradition, still succeeds, in contrast perhaps to some other parts of the United Nations system, in focusing on important practical issues – issues which confront everyone who has spoken on this rostrum daily.

I hope also that the Governing Body Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference will take due note of the efficiency and productivity, if I may use the term, of the Resolutions Committee this year. Important issues were discussed; useful and instructive conclusions were reached; and initiatives for future action of this Organisation were sketched out.

With these few but heartfelt words, and with my renewed thanks to all who have participated in the Resolutions Committee, I commend its report as set out in Provisional Record No. 28 to this august assembly for adoption.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The general discussion on the report of the Resolutions Committee is now open.

Mr. CASTLE (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – As this Conference draws to its close, the efficient and serene progress of the work of the last three weeks provides a very visible testimony of the wise choice that was made when Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues was invited to preside over this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference; I should like to congrualate him and the other Officers of the Conference. The efficiency and serenity of which I have spoken have rubbed off on the work of the Resolutions Committee and, as a result, the productivity of our Committee has improved considerably this year. We completed the general discussion of four resolutions and, as you have heard, we have three important resolutions to present before the Conference today. This achievement was to a large extent due to an exceptional degree of understanding, perception and cooperation between all the members of the Committee.

The first resolution – an old friend of this Conference at least over the past four years – was adopted, as you have heard, with record speed, but a speed which hides the lengthy preparations which preceded its adoption. I earnestly hope, however, that the speed with which it was adopted will not be matched by the speed with which it is forgotten. It focused on the important "role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment". I hope that it will be given prominence in any press release made about the work of the Resolutions Committee this year, and that it will be referred to frequently in the future. And for this, I thank, on behalf of the Employers' group, all those who made the adoption of this resolution possible.

The second resolution, concerning employment promotion as an essential component of overall development, was adopted by consensus. It helps to draw attention to the need for action, as a matter of priority, to formulate and apply active policies to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, through sustained economic growth and development, and thereby raise the standard of living of the population. The resolution does not forget to urge everyone concerned to develop a "market-oriented macroeconomic environment as a means of solving problems of unemployment and developing overall growth".

The third resolution, concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families, provides a timely reminder of an important problem which remains in our midst. As the record shows, this resolution was also adopted by consensus. At this point, since you might get a misleading impression from reading the report of our discussions of the Preamble, I would like to place on record that the Employers' group is in no way prepared to condone acts of "racism and xenophobia" wherever and whenever these may occur. Employers are firmly committed to take appropriate action to combat all acts of "racism and xenophobia".

We ran out of time to consider amendments to the fourth resolution on the agenda, concerning the development of democracy, the internationalisation of the economy and the promotion of tripartism. We also ran out of time to discuss the fifth resolution, proposed by employers, concerning the settlement of industrial disputes. The first of these two orphans would have required much work and effort to make it a more balanced resolution which could be supported by employers. The second, employers consider, raises important issues and we fully anticipate they will return to ask us for adoption next year, so be prepared.

As I have already pointed out, all three resolutions before the Conference were adopted by consensus in the Committee. I urge the Conference to do the same.

Before I leave the rostrum, however, I want to pay a special tribute to the way in which our Chairman led our discussions with firmness, efficiency and a quiet, timely good humour. I considered it an honour and a privilege to work with him and with Mr. Tapiola, the leader of the Workers' group. If ever I needed confirmation of his understanding, his shrewdness and his negotiating skills, I got it during the past two weeks. Dare I say that he also showed a spirit of enterprise when leading his group?

Finally, my thanks to all the members of the Committee for their cooperation, Government representatives and members of the Workers' and Employers' groups, and, last but by no means least, my thanks to the representative of the Director-General and his staff without whose dedication and sleepless nights and endless sandwiches we would not have been able to do our work.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' member, Finland; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – At this stage of our Conference I shall try to be brief. The report of the Resolutions Committee gives a factual account of what happened and I urge its adoption. I shall try to concentrate on why it happened and what this means.

We had a good constructive two-and-a-half weeks of work. Everyone wanted to get results. We exercised more than usually our skills in bilateral negotiation between workers and employers and I wish particular to thank Mr. Castle and the whole Employers' group for that.

As a result, as the first of the three resolutions we have one on the development of enterprises including small and medium-sized enterprises, and their role in employment creation.

This issue had been proposed to the Resolutions Committee several times before by the Employers' group, as Mr. Castle just reminded us. Last year we did come close to discussing a resolution on this subject and several governments announced already their support for the topic, and I think that we did say from the Workers' group side that we would study this carefully. With the changes that all our economies and societies have witnessed and are witnessing, the Workers' group wished to focus on the influence which enterprises, right from the beginning of the process of enterprise creation, can and should have on employment.

The extent of the worldwide employment crisis is such that it will not be solved solely through the measures we have traditionally relied upon, such as stimulating large enterprises, or stimulating demand in general, or through direct job creation measures by public authorities. This does not mean that the economy does not need both general and targetted encouragement. The resolution refers to economic, industrial, investment and employment policies, which create a certain positive framework.

Now we understand that, within this framework, what should happen is more or less the following: people can start looking at how to start or expand enterprise activities; they have access to education and training and support for these activities; they have the necessary consultations and negotiations with their employees on how to do this best, in accordance with internationally accepted labour standards; and the net result of all of this is an increase in decent employment.

If anyone has difficulty in understanding what the text means, as of course a consensus text may not be as easy to read as a straightforward position of either employers or workers, if the text is difficult to read, then maybe you could engage Mr. Castle and some people from the Workers' side as consultants to help you, strictly respecting a zero growth budget, of course. But in any event, I do not think that will be necessary. The Governing Body will certainly be able to express its views on the direction of ILO programmes to follow up this resolution.

The second resolution I would like to characterise as a straightforward and necessary resolution on employment which, at least for trade unions, is the main concern today. Here also we talk of the need for governments to establish a framework for substantial employment growth, both quantitatively and qualitatively.

We ask the ILO to assess what has happened since the adoption of the World Employment Programme in the seventies. It would seem to be useful to have such an assessment as an input to the planned second high-level meeting on employment and structural adjustment which most probably will take place in the next budget biennium.

The Workers' group is satisfied that this year it has been possible to adopt a resolution on migrant workers. The concerns of those who were most reluctant to have such a resolution were addressed in the course of our discussions and what we have here is a much needed commitment for action by the ILO. This will be a major issue in most of our countries in future years. Last year at the conclusion of our Conference the Workers' group was alarmed. We felt that this Organisation was seeming to turn its back on migrant workers, a group which is among the most exploited and the least equipped to defend its rights. Now we are on course again.

I wish to record that the Workers' group is extremely sad that the Committee as a whole was not able to condemn unanimously the acts of racism and xenophobia directed against migrant workers. We did not expect to vote on this kind of issue and we are disappointed that the majority in the Committee was content merely with expressing concern over these evil acts, and I welcome in this respect the statement just made by Mr. Castle.

I do hope that we shall all, all groups, reflect on this so that in the future we can continue to condemn what we all know is nothing else than condemnable.

What happened in the Resolutions Committee also means that this Committee is perfectly capable of functioning well and adapting to the expectations of the Conference. I would respectfully submit to those who are very concerned about the way in which this Committee functions, or even about its necessity, that it is very much alive – as is shown by the fact that it has produced three substantive resolutions, which are relevant to the core mandate of the ILO.

Finally, I wish to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Ejalu, for his solid, prompt and tranquil way of conducting our work.

I wish to acknowledge my renewed pleasure in working with Mr. Castle, who deserves a lot of personal credit for the results of our work.

I wish to thank the Governments for their constructive role in both collective and individual drafting.

I wish to thank Mr. Chambers and his colleagues of the Office for their continuing support and high professional quality.

This was a good meeting, and they made a good report of it.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

I am the representative of the Government of Iraq. It is my pleasure to express my thanks to Mr. Ejalu, the Chairman of the Resolutions Committee and Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Uganda, for his diligent work in chairing the Committee, and for his patience in applying the Standing Orders. I would also like to congratulate the two Vice-Chairmen and all the other members of the Committee for their efforts, flexibility and skill which led to the adoption of three resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted by the Committee either unanimously or by consensus. Amongst these resolutions we have one concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families, a resolution adopted by consensus. The comments made by the delegation of my country on this resolution concerned paragraph 2(f), i.e. the question of compensation or reparations due to migrant workers as a result of the Gulf conflict. In fact, the resolution that we have adopted concerns the working conditions of migrant workers in all countries of the world, and this resolution also concerns the protection of their rights and those of their families, as well as the application of international labour standards.

However, the Gulf conflict is a very special case and a temporary issue. It is a case on which the Security Council has already adopted resolutions and a compensation fund has been created for this purpose. That fund has distributed forms to the countries concerned, requiring them to be filled in so that the necessary measures can then be taken by the compensation fund. The resolution on the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families is a general resolution whereas, I repeat, the Gulf conflict is a temporary issue. Since the question of compensation is being dealt with in the context of the Security Council, and in order to avoid duplication of efforts, my country's delegation asked for the deletion of this paragraph when we were discussing the text of the resolution in the Committee. This is still our opinion here in the plenary of the Conference. The Gulf conflict is within the competence of the United Nations and the Security Council; is not within the competence of the ILO.

As we have already said, the Security Council has adopted the necessary resolutions. We believe that, were the ILO to intervene in this field, we would be duplicating work being done elsewhere, and therefore wasting resources.

My country's delegation supports the resolutions adopted by the Committee and would like to record its reservations regarding paragraph 2(f) of the resolution on the rights of migrant workers and their families, because everything regarding the Gulf conflict and paragraph 2(f) is within the purview of the United Nations and the Security Council.

Mrs. HAGEN (Employers' adviser, United States) – I would like to extend my warm but belated congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President, and also to the three Vice-Presidents on their election. They have all done their jobs in a superb, efficient and gracious manner.

My congratulations and thanks also to the Chairman of the Resolutions Committee Mr. Ejalu, and to Vice-Chairmen Tapiola and Castle of the Resolutions Committee, with whom I have had the opportunity to work through these weeks of the International Labour Conference. It has been a real pleasure for me to be a part of the experience of the Resolutions Committee. We have produced three remarkable resolutions based on a genuine effort on the part of all parties concerned to reach accommodation and common understanding of the goals of the ILO in these particular questions.

I certainly appreciate the way in which our Vice-Chairman, Mr. Castle, represented the Employers' interests in making all of that happen. I wanted simply to add to what he has said today by remarking in particular about the importance of the first resolution that we adopted. It was approved very quickly and unanimously in the Resolutions Committee, with wholehearted and genuine willingness among the participants to move the ILO increasingly in the direction of supporting free enterprise, the advancement of small and medium enterprises and the entrepreneurial approach. By so doing, the ILO will stimulate employment growth throughout the world.

What I wanted to say in the context of this resolution, which is especially important from the points of view of the Employers' group of the United States, is that one needs to think about the significance of supporting an effort to stimulate free enterprise, and what that means in terms of individual initiative.

We have repeatedly attempted during our participation in ILO discussions to highlight the significance of the participation of individual employers and individual workers in the deliberations of each country, and in making good employment policy good labour policy. The importance of including individuals as social partners is something that we need to highlight, especially as we look at efforts to stimulate medium and small enterprise and the entrepreneurial approach in the coming years.

In this respect, the resolutions focus on the participation of employers' and workers' organisations, and not individual employers and individual employers and individual workers. It is our belief that a combination of organisations and individuals is what needs to be taken into account as appropriate under various circumstances.

Clearly, in some situations in some countries there are different combinations of employers' organisations, of workers' organisations, and of individual participants in the process. It is this combination of things that we feel is especially important to consider now as we look at the advancement of enterprise in the future.

There are some particular concerns that we had as the deliberations proceeded through the resolutions Committee, particularly with regard to the second and third resolutions that we considered. One of them had to do with the reference to fair trade rather than free trade. We think it is a major concern in the long run for all of us to accomplish an environment of free trade, in order to stimulate the participation of all people in constructive employment growth.

There was also a clear commitment to encouraging the recognition of the appropriateness of consultation of workers' and employers' organisations throughout the series of resolutions. Yet, in one instance, there was the provision of directly involving such organisations in the development of policy: it is our view in the United States that this is not entirely feasible in a process that defers policy-making to a legislative setting.

For these minor reasons and for the general reason of emphasising the importance of the first resolution that we adopted on enterprise growth, and the appropriateness of focusing on individual participation in the context of enterprise development, I wanted to say these few words today.

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in these deliberations and I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the staff of the Resolutions Committee for the excellent work that they have done in making this a very productive session.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RESOURCES: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Human Resources.

It is my pleasure to invite to the rostrum Mr. Piotrowski, Government delegate, Poland, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate, Kenya, Employer Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Jonzon, Government delegate, Sweden, Reporter of the Committee.

I would ask Mr. Jonzon to kindly submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on Human Resources – I have the honour to present to the Conference the report and conclusions of the Committee on Human Resources, which are found in Provisional Record No. 29.

Among the United Nations agencies, the ILO is one of the most important contributors to human resources development.

The ILO devotes over half of its technical cooperation effort to training activities in all sectors and branches of the economy, and at all levels of responsibility. Human resources development remains at the heart of ILO concerns under almost all its major programmes. It should therefore surprise no one that the Committee on Human Resources attracted many engaged delegates.

The Committee was deeply committed to its task; my own experience with a dozen or so Conference committees tells me that hardly ever before has a topic generated so much interest and caused so many substantive interventions in the meeting room.

The issue of human resources development was treated within the context of structural adjustment. The Committee devoted a lot of attention not only to the response to structural adjustment, but constantly referred back to the causes and consequences of structural change. In my opinion this is a clear sign that we need to continue to improve our knowledge and understanding of the fundamental underlying relationship between human resources development and social and economic development and, indeed, of the very strong interactions among the several components of human resources development. Accordingly, the need for further policy-oriented research in this area is clear.

There is a second aspect of our debate to which I would like to draw your attention. Although occasionally reference was made in the Committee to Convention No. 142 concerning vocational guidance and vocational training in the development of human resources and the supplementing Recommendation No. 150, it is my understanding that these instruments were not perceived to be major blueprints for governments and institutions in developing their training policies and systems. This is surprising, given that Convention No. 142 has attained the second highest number of ratifications of all Conventions adopted during the past two decades. The general survey submitted by the Committee of Experts last year covering these two instruments and the ensuing debate in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards were barely, if at all, mentioned in our discussions.

This state of affairs merits serious consideration from various angles and the question I am asking myself is, to what extent is this a reflection of the relevance of these particular instruments or perhaps of something even more fundamental? The majority of you might ask other questions and reach your conclusions.

For obvious reasons, and as customary, the report on the Committee's deliberations reflects in very condensed form the essence of the numerous contributions to our debate. I wish to place on record that the conclusions which you find in the report are the result of the joint efforts of all the members of the Committee.

It is not appropriate on this last day of the 79th Session to repeat what is in the report that you have before you. I will therefore be very brief and highlight only a few things.

First of all, opinions diverged on several crucial points, but decisions were taken in a pleasant and democratic atmosphere. However, in addition to what is stated in the report, we might today get further observations from delegates regarding our conclusions.

The Committee underscored the crucial importance of the "human capital" component of national wealth and development, but agreed also that there is no panacea or miracle policy to be used in all countries and in all circumstances when it comes to human resource development within the context of structural adjustment. Further, it was underlined that while human resources development is a critical means of facilitating structural adjustment, it also has fundamental social objectives. It is the means by which individuals can increase their well-being, contribute to the improvement of their communities and participate fully in the democratic process.

Great attention was paid to the vital role of tripartite collaboration for the progress of human resources development, and in that connection it was stressed that the ILO has an important responsibility to continue to act as an advocate for the poor and vulnerable groups in society.

In essence, our conclusions form an imperative for action to the tripartite community and they give the ILO a mandate and a broad agenda for future work within the field of human resource development. Therefore I think our Committee has fulfilled the task it was given. And the main reason for that is – I can assure you – the competent and indeed pleasant manner in which our Chairman, Mr. Piotrowski, and our two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Douglas and Mr. Owuor, literally took care of both the work and the members of the Committee.

The secretariat was equally professional, dedicated and charming around the clock, and on behalf of the Committee I want to thank all of these people I have referred to.

I would like, very briefly, to add just a few – or perhaps two – general and simple reflections based upon experiences on many conference committees, and confirmed in our Committee.

The first one refers to procedures in committee work. In order at all to complete an immense task – namely consideration of hundreds of amendments – certain procedures could and should be simplified.

For example, voting could sometimes be less formal. Our Committee unanimously introduced what we called an "informal vote", used when we were unable easily and quickly to agree on an amendment. It was not a formal vote, but a practical procedure that we adopted. When the Committee was not in full agreement on informal procedures, or when matters of fundamental importance were at stake, the Committee returned to and relied upon the written rules.

When we go to a vote, in reality we know the result already after the first two questions: governments in favour and governments against. Why always, and on minor points, continue with the remaining seven questions and a complicated mathematical exercise? I am convinced that, over the years, such practical attempts to expedite the work in various committees have been introduced, and I think they should be considered.

Secondly, we all know that Workers and Employers always are well organised, and members of their groups are always well informed, and that is very excellent. That, however, is not the situation among Governments, and as a result we sometimes feel left aside: we are not always on stage but among the audience.

Again I think that very simple and practical arrangements could be made, with just a little, and always totally neutral, assistance from the Office, to improve the work of Government delegates. At a short meeting of the Government members of each committee, for example immediately after the officers of the committee have been elected, the Office could give information and explain some of the procedures that will take place during the following weeks.

For example, it is , in reality, often better tactics in a vote to abstain, rather than to vote against, if you are not in favour of an amendment. Workers and Employers know that, and act accordingly. Why should not all Government members know the same?

Another advantage would be that from the ve first day we would get to know who belongs to th Government group and who does not; and perha
we could then also find better ways of selecti Government members to working parties than tho now in use.

I am convinced that if we, within the framework the Constitution and the Standing Orders, adopt practical rather than a procedural approach to o work, and if Government members of a Committ occasionally met as a group and received some info mation from the Office relevant to the reality in th committee room, many misunderstandings and ma unnecessary votes could be avoided.

It is a simple matter of developing and better ut lising the human resources of committee participan in general, and Government members in particula
With these words, I formally submit the report a the conclusions of the Committee on Human R sources for approval and adoption.

Mr. OWUOR (Employers' member, Kenya, Vic
Chairman of the Committee on Human Resources)
May I second the adoption of the report and concl sions of the Committee on Human Resources.

The Commitee's deliberations were as interesti as they were useful, thanks to the good leadersh provided by the Chairman. There were light m ments as well as moments of suspense and dram
The results have been a set of practical suggestio and recommendations, which governments, e ployers, workers and the ILO will find helpful in p paring their plans of action on human resources d velopment in response to structural adjustment.

The work of the Committee was facilitated in t first instance by an excellent Office report on a justment and human resources development, whi had accurately analysed the effects of structural a justment on education and training budgets, as w as the various responses to structural adjustment governments, employers and training institutions various regions.

In considering the report, the Committee not that structural adjustment is a corrective proce aimed at achieving improved living standards, f employment, competitive and profitable underta ings and sustainable, non-inflationary econom growth. But, given the different conditions prevaili in each country, depending on the state of develo ment as well as the internal and external shocks which each country's economy is subjected, the a justment measures, as well as the timing and s quencing of the adjustment programmes, despi their broad commonalities, will, of necessity, diff from country to country.

The Committee noted that securing the highe possible level of education and training for all wor ers is vital for structural adjustment, as well as f economic and social progress.

The report calls for governments to have the pol ical will to mobilise all appropriate human mater and financial resources to reverse the negative i pact that stabilisation and adjustment have had education and training budgets.

The report suggests the need for mobilisation non-governmental funding for education and trai ing, through training levies, tax rebates or credits a government subsidies, as the case may be.

On the determination of comprehensive human resources development policies the report recommends that this should be done in consultation with the social partners, preferably through national training boards and similar bodies, as appropriate.

On containing the social costs of adjustment the report recommends such mitigating measures as retraining of retrenched workers, the promotion of productive and freely chosen self-employment through training credit and other support programmes and targeted social assistance for the most vulnerable groups.

The report proposes the need to set up equal opportunity commissions, or similar bodies, in order to ensure equal and non-discriminatory access to training by women.

The report recognises the important role played by the informal sector in development and proposes entrepreneurial training for self-employment and other training programmes, as well as credit facilities directed at this sector, especially in developing countries, with the basic objective of progressively integrating this sector with the formal sector.

On the role of the social partners, the report expects employers and workers to cooperate actively in the formulation of national and sectoral training policies and in the implementation of training programmes.

The report, in particular, recognises the important role played by employers' organisations in stimulating training by enterprises through the provision of information and technical services on the design and implementation of industry and plant-level courses that will facilitate the access of workers to training. It also encourages governments, especially in developing countries, to consider introducing innovative education and training methodologies such as distance learning, video and radio programmes so as to minimise staff costs.

The report calls for the ILO to strengthen its leadership role in the advocacy of human resources development, as well as in strengthening its collaboration with Bretton Woods institutions and member countries in designing retraining and compensation programmes to alleviate the adverse social impact of structural adjustment. In this regard, it is satisfying to note that the Committee rejected a spirited attempt to make ILO technical assistance conditional upon certain political behaviour by member countries, as such a conditionality could only harm the victims of oppression, the poor and the disabled.

May I take this opportunity to thank the Employers' group for electing me as their spokesman in this Committee, and for the support which I received from the Employer members of the Committee. I wish also to express my thanks to the Chairman of the Committee for his successful guidance of the work of the Committee, to the Reporter and his tripartite team for their work in drafting the Committee's conclusions, to the secretariat for their untiring efforts in producing all the documents when required and to the interpreters for facilitating our work.

I therefore commend the adoption of this report by the Conference.

Final record vote on the Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The result of the vote is as follows: 281 votes in favour, 65 against, with 42 abstentions. Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I have a request for an explanation of vote, but this will take place at a later time.

After this final record vote, I should like all of you to join with me in congratulating the Clerk of the Conference and the other members of the secretariat for their very excellent work.

Reply of the Director-General to the Discussion of his Report

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I now have the honour to ask Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, to give his reply to the discussion on his Report.

Original – French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – If it were necessary to judge, essentially or exclusively, on the basis of figures, the Report that I have submitted to you this year seems to have given rise to great interest. 1992 is indeed a record year: a greater number of delegations present at the Conference, 151 of the 158 member States; a greater number of speakers, the highest number ever recorded, 299; a greater number of ministers, 121 ministers present, including two prime ministers.

These figures are an eloquent testimony of the vitality, the universality and the topical nature of our Organisation, its principles and its action in a world undergoing many changes. But obviously the figures are not enough, it is necessary to make an in-depth analysis.

The first matter which struck me in your discussions is that for the first time in a very long time the very great majority of our member States are speaking the same language where democracy is concerned. Mr. Miller, the Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Czechoslovakia, reminded us of how this word was able to be manipulated, covering policies and practices which are anything but democratic. If some have stressed that there is no single model for democracy, if it is incumbent upon each country to develop the institutions which correspond to their own realities, culture and traditions, this diversity should not make us lose sight of certain fundamental principles which must be respected in every society which seeks to be democratic.

As Mr. Bhuiyan, Minister for Labour and Manpower of Bangladesh, pointed out, it is in its form, not in its essence, that democracy may be shaped by the historical experience of a society.

The very essence of democracy, as many of you have pointed out in this discussion, includes: the primacy of law; individual and collective freedoms guaranteed by law; equality of all before the law; the recognition and the respect of the diversity of opinions, interests, beliefs and cultures; full and free participation of citizens in the political, economic and social life of the country. There may be no compromise with respect to these basic principles.

There may be no compromise either on the application of these principles to the world of work. In order for a democracy to have real meaning, political freedoms must be accompanied by some economic and social rights: the freedom of enterprise and trade; the freedom of association and collective bargaining; the right to choose employment freely and the right to equal opportunities and treatment; and, especially, tripartite dialogue which allows the social actors to participate freely with the public authorities in drawing up and implementing an economic and social policy which is the very foundation of our Organisation.

Your discussion revealed that there is not only a wider consensus on these fundamental principles but also – and this is even more positive – a worldwide determination to put these into practice.

We also had overwhelming proof of this when we had the privilege of welcoming Mr. Chiluba, President of the Republic of Zambia, who was recently chosen by his people, in the first free elections, to occupy the highest post in his country. No one represents better than he does the closest of ties which may exist between political freedoms and trade union freedoms – he who has been the victim of several measures of repression and intimidation because of his trade union activities. He addressed to us a fervent appeal to promote democratic values, tolerance and especially social dialogue.

He also informed us of his concern with the disastrous situation that his country's economy faces; and he made an appeal to international solidarity, and especially to the ILO – "cradle of ideals which triumphed in Zambia" – to assist his country to find a way out of this situation.

It is thus a message of hope, but also of concern, that he addressed to us. For nothing can be taken for granted.

Many of you have highlighted the weakness of the democracy that has been achieved with so much difficulty, the new threats it faces, the enormous gap which exists between the great principles proclaimed and the very difficult realities of the world of work.

Your concerns were of two types. Concern first of all regarding respect for human rights. Many Workers' delegates from all over the world denounced – sometimes vehemently – infringements of fundamental rights of workers and especially infringements of freedom of association even in countries with a long tradition of democracy; and it is not possible to hide here the discord which appears between these complaints and the satisfaction claimed too easily by some.

Full exercise of these rights is, however, the cornerstone of every democratic society. Unfortunately, I can only note the long list of complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body which but confirms that the respect of this fundamental right is far from being anchored in custom and practice. The supervisory machinery that the ILO has set up, especially concerning human rights, must therefore continue to function with the same vigilance and same objectiveness as in the past, for the credibility of our Organisation as a defender of democratic values depends upon this. This does not mean that this machinery may not be improved. But human rights constitute an area in which, in the light of our discussions, we should strengthen our action. Here I am referring to the struggle against discrimination. Many have referred to the growing threat looming over democracy and peace; intolerance, xenophobia, racial, ethnic, nationalist and religious conflict. You also expressed your deep feelings concerning the magnitude of this phenomenon which is taking on dramatic and bloody proportions in some countries. The ILO has an important role to play in this area. Our principles in this connection, enshrined in Convention No. 111, are clear. I have mentioned them in my Report. We must also strengthen our activities to promote and monitor these standards as well as our practical assistance to member States and social partners to set up programmes and machinery to fight against this scourge.

The Conference has embarked upon a new and perhaps final stage in our struggle against the most unacceptable from of discrimination: apartheid in South Africa. By ratifying the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, which was held in Harare in May, it urged the parties concerned to make every effort to ensure that negotiations for a new Constitution lead to an agreement and to the establishment as soon as possible of an interim democratic and non-racial government. Let us hope, as President Chiluba said, that at the next session of the Conference we will no longer have to mention this sensitive issue but as an unfortunate memory of the past.

The second major subject of concern reflected in your discussion relates to the economic context in which the democratisation process is taking place. Democracy, as you all said, cannot survive without a healthy economy which enables true social progress to be achieved. It is the contrary which is occurring in most of our member States – whether developing countries or the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. Statements made by delegates of these countries reflected their deep concern regarding stagnation and the regression of their economies, runaway inflation, increasing unemployment, the reduced purchasing power of workers, and poverty, which are taking on catastrophic proportions. Democracy is a word void of any meaning in such conditions.

Thus it is not surprising that the question of economic reforms is at the heart of your discussions. Many appeals were addressed to the ILO for assistance in redressing a social situation which continues to worsen in most of the member countries following these reforms.

I am very sensitive to these appeals. The ILO would be remiss in fulfilling its mandate if it did not accord priority attention to the promotion of full employment and the struggle against poverty, even and especially in the difficult conditions that we are experiencing today. It is not surprising either that this subject gave rise to contrary arguments. The reverse would have surprised us. And I would like to thank all those who have allowed us to enrich and determine the policy that we should pursue in this area.

In what direction should we move? Your discussion has enabled us to identify five major areas for our action.

First of all, we must recognise the need for restructuring and economic reform and we must assist our member States within the confines of our mandate to implement these measures. President Chiluba said, in speaking of the precarious situation of the economy which he inherited, that his Government had no other choice than that of liberalising the economy, reducing State intervention and eliminating subsidies. Mr. Wijentunge, Prime Minister of Sri Lanka, stated that for his Government, the liberalisation of the economy is a prerequisite for democracy. Mr. Kebitch, Prime Minister of Belarus, used virtually the same words when he said that for his Government the main principle of democracy is a market economy, even if the transition process towards a market economy is difficult and gives rise to contradictions. The ILO would not be rendering a service to its member States, to its workers, if it denied the unavoidable need for such reforms.

But second, we must see to it that these reforms are designed with social justice in mind. This means first of all, as we all have stated, that they must generate employment. Jobs are not created in a vacuum. In order to have productive employment we need to have profitable enterprises. A resolution adopted by you yesterday calls upon the ILO to pay particular attention to promoting the creation of enterprises as an important means of job creation. The first priority will thus be the training of entrepreneurs and managers of enterprises, as well as general training.

I was struck by the importance given by many speakers to training. For instance, Mr. Mellao Neto, the Minister of State of Labour and Administration of Brazil, pointed out that his country is now paying a heavy toll for not having invested enough in education and training. As he put it, they did not understand that the major asset of a nation is the people who live and work there.

But education and training, for all their importance, are not enough. Many of you emphasised others factors that have to be taken into consideration – investment and development policy, a legal context conducive to the creation of enterprises and jobs, a functional employment market, an entire network of public and private institutions to facilitate both the development and the conversion of enterprises, manpower mobility and placement, and a basic infrastructure, the very establishment of which may create jobs. These are many spheres where the ILO must be prepared to make a contribution.

But social justice also dictates that governments of democratic states cannot shirk their responsibility for the well-being of their people, for a just distribution of national income and wealth and for social protection, and especially the social protection of the most disadvantaged segments of the population. I concur with the comments and suggestions made in this regard by Mr. Tapiola, the Workers' delegate from Finland. Here too, the ILO faces enormous tasks judging from the many request for assistance addressed to us during your discussions: the development of social legislation in conformity with the standards of our Organisation, the development of labour administrations capable of assuming new functions, of listening to the social partners and ensuring respect for the law, and the development of fair and viable social security systems.

Third, we must recognise that the law of the market on its own cannot solve the problems of society. Many delegates, and especially the Workers' representatives, have vigorously stressed the risks of placing blind trust in the market forces. For instance, Mr. Custer, the Secretary-General of the World Confederation of Labour, warned the ILO against the danger of assimilating democratisation with the development of a market economy, stating that this could lead to confusion regarding the very principles of the Organisation. Mr. Tapiola and Mr. Friso, the General Secretary of the ICFTU, criticised my report on this point, stating that they felt that it was incorrect and dangerous to suggest that the free workings of supply and demand could, acting alone, effectively ensure the production and the distribution of goods and services. I would like to eliminate some misunderstandings which could have arisen in this connection through the rather equivocal use of the word "alone". "Alone" may mean either that there is no other system comparable to the market economy, or that the market economy, reduced to the workings of supply and demand alone, is sufficient to cover all of the concerns of the ILO.

While our common sense and experience may tell us that the market is much more flexible and efficient in the use of resources and in the management of enterprises than would be a central bureaucracy, it would be contrary to all the principles and all the achievements of the ILO to advocate returning to what some might call "wild capitalism". The withdrawal of the State from certain functions which may be carried out better by private enterprise and collective bargaining can in no case mean its total rejection of any and all responsibility as regards economic and social policies. Social justice, which is the ultimate goal of our Organisation, requires as a minimum that the State should set the rules of fair play for the market economy and establish an equitable legal framework for social relations and collective bargaining, in consultation of course with the main parties concerned, the employers and the workers. It also demands that the State ensure strict enforcement of these rules.

Fourthly, we have to ensure that tripartism develops in our member States. To quote an expression which I find most appropriate and which was used by Mr. Atasayar, the Employers' delegate of Turkey, the problems created by democratisation can and must be resolved according to the principles of democracy. This tripartism, which lies at the base of our Organisation's originality as well as its strength, is far from being strongly rooted in the customs of all our member States. It is only if the social partners can be associated with the economic reforms, if they understand the need for them and take part in guiding them, that they will accept the efforts and sacrifices such reforms will mean for them.

Tripartism presupposes the existence of autonomous and truly representative organisations of employers and workers which are able to speak on behalf of their members, and this ability presupposes true democracy within these organisations. The absence of one of the parties at the negotiating table distorts the outcome. Tripartism also presupposes the State's desire to respect the independence of the two social partners and to listen to their views and take them into account. Lastly, tripartism presupposes a true desire for the sort of dialogue where no party remains entrenched in any given position or ideology, which would render any dialogue impossible, where obviously each party defends the interests of its members but is ready to compromise in the general interests of society. Therefore, taking up what Mr. Oechslin said, it is necessary that in each country the government and the independent social partners should establish their own tripartism as well as their own democracy. This is a time-consuming and never-ending process. The ILO must be the catalyst for this slow process of change and must modestly assist all its constituents in achieving their aims.

Fifthly, within the limits of our abilities we must promote greater international solidarity so as to tackle these problems. I heard the word "solidarity" mentioned in many speeches. How, for example, can one remain unmoved by the appeal put forward by Mrs. Ahoyo, the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Benin, for greater international solidarity to support young democracies in Africa in order to stop Africa being the weakest link in the chain of world interdependence?

Our objective must be to ensure that in all efforts aimed at revitalising and reforming the world economy, one should never lose sight of their social aspects or objectives. In particular, we must reinforce our dialogue with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, to which many references were made during this discussion. I would like to emphasise that we are speaking of a dialogue and not a war, and this dialogue is now starting to bear fruit. Both sides have a better understanding of the possibilities at the disposal of our respective organisations. Just as we accept the need for economic reforms, today the other side accepts more readily the need to take into account the social objectives and the social consequences of adjustment policies when they are drawing up their programmes.

Thus, following this line of thought, we can reply to Mr. Sunmonu, the Secretary General of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, who asked us to prevent the social and economic fires breaking out as a result of structural adjustment programmes, rather than simply acting as a fire brigade. Of course, a great deal remains to be done so as to make our cooperation with these institutions more operational.

May I now refer to the discussion that took place in the special sitting on the Appendix to my Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

I have noted that many of you expressed justified concern regarding the situation described in my Report, particularly with regard to the insufficiency of social cover for these workers, the strict security measures to which they are often subjected, especially in the Gaza Strip, and the restrictions imposed by the Israeli authorities on the exercise of freedom of association. These difficult conditions are aggravated by an economic environment which was disrupted by the effects of the Gulf war and where unemployment remains high.

Since last year's session of the Conference peace talks have been initiated between the parties. This is a welcome development which gives us every reason to be hopeful. We know the difficulties that must still be overcome before peace can reign in this very complex region, and much time and wisdom will be needed to attain this peace. However, I am sure that this fact will not deter people of goodwill.

I told you last year that efforts had to be made in the area of trade unions to ensure the defence of Arab workers in the occupied territories and that it was therefore necessary for the Palestinian unions to be recognised and be able to carry out trade union activities without any interference from the Israeli authorities. In this connection the Israeli federation, the Histadrut and the Palestinian trade unions should get together so as to find an original formula so that Palestinians working in Israel can be adequately represented and their interests truly defended. In the last paragraph of my Report I proposed the good offices of the ILO to assist in the initiation and development of broader dialogue between all parties to find solutions to all the specific problems raised in my Report. This offer remains open, even though it was not taken up by any speaker during the debate. I hope that steps will soon be undertaken to make use of the services of the Office in this connection because it is undoubtedly in the role of providing good offices that we can be the most effective.

It is in this perspective and in this perspective alone that the proposal of nominating a permanent representative of the ILO to the occupied territories could be useful. In the meantime, I am determined to reinforce the presence of the ILO in the occupied territories through technical cooperation programmes. A good example of what we can usefully do is the workers' education project for Palestinian trade unionists to which I attached particular importance and which started in April-May. I welcome the spirit of cooperation shown by the Israeli authorities on this occasion and I hope that the continuation of this project will take place without any obstacles. The ILO will intensify its action so as to provide increased assistance to the Palestinian people whose needs are great.

There remains the problem of knowing whether the Conference in the future should set up a special committee as to examine this question. Such a decision is up to the Governing Body and the Conference itself. We have seen that the setting up of such a committee would give rise to legal problems. which led the Governing Body and the Conference to opt for a debate in a special sitting. In spite of the limitations which some see in this formula, it has nevertheless made it possible to have a frank, open and calm debate before public opinion on a complex, difficult and controversial question.

In conclusion on this subject, I would like to emphasise that as certain speakers wished, I would like an annual report on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories to be no longer necessary and the results of the peace negotiations which are under way to be sufficiently positive so as to make such an exercise unnecessary.

The main conclusion which I have drawn from your discussions, and I said this at the beginning of my reply, is that great hopes are placed in our Organisation. In an ever-changing world, in the whirlwind of events which are taking place each day around us, the ILO and the principles it embodies remain a beacon to guide those responsible for social policy in our member States.

The essential thing is the principles contained in our standards and the machinery we have to supervise their application. As regards our standard-setting activities, it is possible to envisage modifications in our procedures as some have proposed. One can also envisage the revision of certain standards to bring them up to date. One can also give thought to the means of ensuring more effective promotion and more resolute application.

Of course there are divergences on all these points. But these divergences will be resolved, as every problem in the ILO is resolved, through tripartite dialogue and these divergences do not sap the determination of practically all our constituents to safeguard and promote the fundamental principles which are the very essence of democracy and the existence of the ILO.

What is needed first of all is therefore to put these principles in their proper place, that is in the centre of every, and I repeat, every activity of the ILO. I have already made a number of proposals to the Governing Body to reinforce the link between standards and technical cooperation in our Organisation.

It is also necessary for the ILO to take into account the great diversity of situations and needs of our member States and the services they expect.

Secondly, we need therefore to bring the ILO closer to its member States and to develop with them what I have called an active partnership in which we would jointly determine the objectives to be followed and the means to be implemented so as to attain them. In this connection I intend to take a certain number of measures so as to reinforce the presence of the ILO in the field.

Thirdly, we must concentrate our efforts on a limited number of programmes and fields of action which are at the very core of our mandate. It is all the more essential for us to make this effort seeing as we are all living in a climate of austerity, a climate which the ILO cannot disregard. I have committed myself to submit a zero-growth budget to you for the next biennium, but zero-growth does not mean stagnation and I will try within budgetary constraints to carry out certain significant transfers of resources to certain high priority programmes.

You will find these needs reflected in the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1994-95 which will be submitted to you next year. I hope that they will bear witness to true effort and true will to carry out reforms on my part and on the part of the Office. As regards the Office I would like to say to Mr. Thüsing, Employers' delegate, Germany, that his appeal to ILO officials that they be ready to follow new paths has not been overlooked. I am certain that they will respond to this appeal and that they will take up Mr. Thüsing's challenge because they are very much aware of the fact that in the long run, as he said, it is up to them and their ability to adapt to ensure that the ILO will continue to be a political force for social progress.

Other reforms however depend on you. In my opinion, much remains to be done so as to ensure that this Conference as well as other ILO bodies will be less expensive and more efficient. A certain number of measures with this in view have already been adopted; others can still be envisaged, on the condition that you would be ready to accept them of course.

In this new era, so promising, but so full of uncertainty and anxiety, the ILO must stand firm, more so than ever before, on the great principles of freedom, democracy, justice and solidarity which are its raison d'être. But it must be more flexible and effective than ever before in the services it renders to its member States.

Original – Portuguese: Speaking on behalf of all the delegates, I should like to extend to you our sincere congratulations for the value and the depth of your replies to all of the questions that were raised during the course of the general debate on your Report.

I am convinced that all of us have drawn very useful lessons from these replies and that your words will cause us to reflect seriously about the new paths to be taken by our Organisation in the future so that we may continue to strive for social justice. Speaking on behalf of everyone, I thank you very much.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Twenty-ninth sitting

Tuesday, 23 June 1992, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

Final record vote on the Convention and Recommendation concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Before we resume our work, namely the report of the Committee on Human Resources, I would like to give the floor to a delegate to explain his vote on the instruments we adopted this morning.

I call on Mr. Wakaki, Government adviser, Japan.

Original – Japanese: Mr. WAKAKI (Government adviser, Japan) – I would like briefly to explain the position of the Government of Japan concerning its vote. We recognise the significance of adopting the Convention concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, and its accompanying Recommendation, at this session of the International Labour Conference. The adoption of these instruments will certainly help each member State to ensure the payment of wages as the basic means of life of their workers and the protection of workers' claims. In Japan an Act concerning the ensuring of payment of wages to workers has been passed and put into effect in view of the importance of such a system.

The Government of Japan has insisted that the provisions of Conventions should be confined to basic matters – to matters concerning principles – so that they are ratifiable by many countries; indeed, until now, not enough member States have ratified Conventions which have been adopted.

The Government of Japan thinks that the provisions of this Convention are not sufficiently flexible; we also made a similar point during the discussion of the Conclusions of the Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters which were adopted yesterday. We will consider how to deal with the Convention and the Recommendation adopted after we have fully studied their contents.

However, Part II of the Convention contains provisions that cannot be met by our national legislation, thus making it unratifiable.

In view of these circumstances, the Government of Japan abstained from voting for the adoption of the Convention and the Recommendation.

Report of the Committee on Human Resources: Discussion (concl.) and adoption Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume the discussion of the Committee on Human Resources. I give the floor to Mr. Osunde, Workers' adviser, Nigeria, speaking on behalf of Mr. Douglas, Vice-Chairman of the Committee.

Mr. OSUNDE (Workers' adviser, Nigeria) – Since this is the first time I am speaking during this Session the Conference, allow me to congratulate the President and his team for the able manner in which they have handled our work. I speak on behalf of the Workers' members of the Committee on Human Resources and I speak in place of our Vice-Chairman, brother Douglas, of the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions, who has had to leave Geneva.

I would first of all like to express the thanks of the Workers' group to all the different people whose work has contributed to the success of this Committee. Therefore we thank Mr. Piotrowski, the Chairman, whose very capable guidance ensured a balanced and always interesting discussion. We thank Mr. Jonzon, the Reporter of the Committee, whose unerring grasp of the English language always enabled a way to be found for agreement.

We thank the team of the ILO secretariat, led by Mr. Salt and Mr. Lee, who prepared the report and whose work and sleepless nights meant that we could manage to complete everything in these short three weeks. We thank the Government members of our Committees for their very interesting and valuable contribution.

Finally we thank the Employers' group under the capable chairmanship of Mr. Owuor for their generally very positive approach to the deliberations of our Committee.

I would like to take this occasion to offer some views of the Workers' group on the content of the conclusions. I will firstly draw attention to what we think is positive in this report. In this regard we would like to emphasise that as stated in paragraph 1 of the conclusions, and I quote: "In all countries securing the highest possible level of education and training for all workers is vital for structural adjustment as well as for economic and social progress."

This priority statement informed the context of every aspect of our conclusions; economic recovery, social development, equality for women and for disadvantaged groups. None of these is even conceivable without investment in education and training. We believe that all these points should be taken very seriously by all governments undertaking structural adjustment and by the IMF and the World Bank. Investment in education and training should not be reduced, at the risk of delaying the necessary adjustment. We must ensure that education and training levels are maintained in order to guarantee the long-term future of every country.

We would like to emphasise some aspects of ILO action which this Committee is recommending. If I may quote from paragraph 43 of the conclusions: the ILO is called upon to "exercise vigorously its unique role among international organisations as the advocate of tripartite collaboration and as champion of the most vulnerable social groups."

In paragraph 40 the ILO is mandated to strengthen its leadership role in advocating that investment in human resources development is a priority of governments and the social partners during structural adjustment. As regards specific action, the ILO should intensify its dialogue with the IMF and the World Bank and prepare a compendium of approaches to mitigate the social cost of adjustment. The ILO should assist the organisation of national tripartite conferences to evaluate adjustment programmes and seriously consider organising a follow-up meeting to the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in 1987. The ILO should conduct a comparative study of the costs and benefits of different approaches to encourage employers to provide training.

All these proposals should be supported most vigorously when the Governing Body prepares the Programmes and Budget proposals for the next biennium at its session next February and we will welcome such support very warmly.

At this time we regret we cannot support these conclusions before we place on record our strong concern about two aspects of them. Firstly, the Workers' group is extremely concerned about the language used in the last sentence of paragraph 11, where reference is made to employers, workers and, where appropriate, their representative organisations. The use of the words "where appropriate" is entirely unacceptable and is contrary to the founding spirit of the ILO as expressed in the Declaration of Philadelphia. The words suggest that where they wish, employers and governments may ignore the existence of workers' organisations and act entirely on their own. As such this undermines the principle of freedom of association of workers in their own organisation, as expressed in Convention No. 87 and is contrary to the promotion of collective bargaining as expressed in Convention No. 98. For this reason the Workers' group very much regrets that our effort to find a compromise wording which would have addressed these concerns were ruled out of order on procedural grounds.

Secondly, the Workers' group strongly regrets that due to opposition from the Employers and certain Governments, it proved impossible to include any reference to the need for the ILO to stop providing technical assistance to countries systematically violating trade union and other human rights. The Workers' group has already indicated our views on this matter and we will continue to press for a link of this kind until it is formally established. There is no justification, under any circumstances, for the ILO to support countries that both impoverish and suppress people and violate fundamental trade union and human rights. With these reservations and observations expressed, the Workers' group would like to recommend to this Conference the adoption of these conclusions.

Mr. PIOTROWSKI (Government member, Poland; Chairman of the Committee on Human Resources) – The lively and stimulating discussion of the Committee has touched on issues of critical importance to our Organisation and issues that are of vital concern to the citizens of the member States. Despite the passions in which these issues are often addressed the ambience of the meeting remained friendly with its members united by common agreement on the importance of the topic before them.

The members were also united by their sense of privilege in having the opportunity to influence adjustment and human resources development in the context of structural adjustment. The Committee was able to complete its work successfully because of the conscientious and knowledgeable participation of its members and the superb leadership of the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen. The Committee owes a special debt of appreciation to the reporter who displayed such excellent professional leadership in guiding the work of the drafting Committee. I express my thanks to them.

I also wish to express the appreciation of the Committee for the skill and hard work of the secretariats of both the Committee and the Office, without which our work could not have been completed.

Finally, it was a privilege and honour for me personally to preside as Chairman, and I express my gratitude to all the members of the Committee and the secretariat, whose support made my duties in that office a pleasure to carry out.

Mr. CORNACCHIO (Employers' adviser, United States) – I would like to associate myself with those who, speaking before me, have complimented the work of both the Committee and the Office in addressing this very large and important topic in so short a time; and on behalf of the United States Employers' delegation I should like to say that given the short time available to consider the Committee's conclusions, the report before us today is a good one and we support its adoption.

It reaffirms the need for consultation and cooperation to facilitate structural adjustment. It recognises the need to continually adjust education and training to the needs of the market. It highlights the need to safeguard the most vulnerable groups of the population. And lastly, it offers a number of useful suggestions for ILO action.

The report correctly states that there is no general or universal prescription for successful adjustment, and indicates the broad range of innovative responses to structural adjustment which are possible and which do not fall back on the mistaken path of calling for ever-greater involvement of the State in the economy.

However, the report contains a number of incomplete or incorrect formulations concerning cooperation and consultation, as well as a few blanket statements which prejudge matters best left to member States or other institutions, and, in some places, it contains what can be described as wishes, couched in terms which imply factual truth, and I will briefly illustrate some examples.

Moreover, in this era of zero real growth in the budget of the ILO it is unfortunate that, given the pressures of time, the Committee was unable to establish priorities for the 25 or so suggested areas for ILO action.

As a general observation on the formulation for encouraging consultation and cooperation, I would note that there were a number of clauses which referred only to employers' and workers' organisations, when it is clear that individual employers and workers should also be the subject for consultation and cooperation.

In this regard I would refer to the comments made yesterday by my colleague from the United States Employers' delegation when she emphasised the role and concerns of individual workers and employers in regard to public policy.

I would also refer to the terminology used in the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment to express this point, which reads "workers, employers, and where appropriate, their representative organisations", which more accurately reflects the range of interested and important actors and the flexibility needed to account for different systems and traditions. This formulation has nothing to do with calling into question freedom of association, but has everything to do with supporting this principle and recognising that workers should have the freedom to choose not to associate.

There is one section of the report which states that employers' and workers's organisations should participate actively in the formulation and implementation of national training policies and programmes. If this is to mean that through this participation these organisations would be able effectively to veto various policies or programmes which are in the interest of all citizens, then I would take firm objection to this statement. The legislators and administrators of law and policy must be accountable to the needs and priorities of the nation as a whole. Safeguards must exist so that certain employers' or workers' organisations do not block necessary changes which would be in the interest of the public as a whole, but which might have an adverse impact on some of their members.

Similarly, the conclusions state that changes in labour standards can be made only after full tripartite consultation with workers' organisations. However, governments must ensure that consultations do not drag out indefinitely, thus postponing indefinitely those changes which must be made for the benefit of all.

In the category of blanket statements, I would include the statement found in the conclusions which calls on the ILO to continue its dialogue with the Bretton Woods institutions in order to maintain expenditures in education and training during adjustment programmes. However, we are not in a position to state what should be done with the level of expenditure in any given country during structural adjustment. In some cases they may need to be temporarily decreased, or permanently increased, or substantially redirected. The ILO can and should emphasise the critical role of investment in education and training to ensure economic and social development, and it should back up this statement with credible studies and evidence.

However, this statement as it stands ignores the possibility that certain expenditures in education and training may have been counter-productive to economic and social development, despite the no-lose label which is often placed on these expenditures simply because they come under the heading of human resources development.

In the wish category, I would include the statement in the conclusions which implies that substantial resources can be redirected from reductions in military expenditure, and which is problematic in that it contributes to the myth that some large cache of funds stands ready for spending from this source. In my own country, which, I would add, has the largest debt in the world, there will be heavy pressure to reduce the federal deficit rather than to increase other spending programmes with any funds that are freed from reduced military expenditure.

With these caveats in mind, I would like to place on record that while we support the adoption of the report, given the number of reservations I have expressed, we see the conclusions of this discussion as a good indication of the direction which the ILO should take in the area of human resource development, and not as a final statement on the issue.

Mr. PETERSON (Government adviser, United States) – The ILO has taken up various critical aspects of employment and structural adjustment at recent sessions of the International Labour Conference following the 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment and throughout most of the past decade. At the 79th Session, we have come to the heart of the matter for the ILO: "adjustment and human resources development."

Report VI, prepared for this Session, provided an excellent summary of ways countries have responded to economic change and widespread restructuring during the past decade. It posed a central question for discussion: "How can education and training be made to support structural adjustment in the best possible manner?"

The Committee report reflects a wide-ranging and very useful discussion of that question from various points of view, all pointing to a common theme: the critical importance of human resources development to economies striving to adjust and achieve sustainable economic growth and create new jobs within the context of structural adjustment.

Structural policies have never been more important than they are today. In particular, reductions in both agricultural and industrial subsidies and the removal of rigidities in labour markets would reduce inflation, contribute to reductions in budget deficits, make higher growth and output possible, and in the final analysis help more people find jobs. Education and training are central to positive adjustment.

The United States strongly supports the conclusions that "investing in its people is perhaps the most effective course of action a country can take in order to ensure its long-term future". We believe that "the ultimate responsibility rests with each country to design and manage its own programmes of education and training in support of its adjustment efforts".

The demands of new technology have made education and training critical to sustainable economic growth and global competitiveness. In today's international economy, workers must be prepared to change the ways they do their jobs in order to capture the benefits from rapidly evolving technology. Training goes hand in hand with productivity, quality, flexibility, and automation in the best performings firms.

The advent of the computer, high-speed communication and universal education are heralding a third industrial revolution, the key feature of which is the high-performance work organisation. It is becoming evident that the key organisational task is not to design the most elegant structure, but to capture individual capabilities and motivate the entire organisation to respond cooperatively to a complicated and dynamic environment.

The assumptions of the past are breaking down. We can no longer categorically say that schools are the problem and business is the solution or that school is school and work is work. Changes in the global economy and in society have made both these assumptions obsolete. Today, more than ever before, "school is about working and work is about learning". Put those thoughts together and they bring us to a provocative conclusion!

In a demanding, competitive, free-market environment, companies cannot prosper unless the schools graduate a continuing stream of well-educated, self-disciplined and motivated young people. Students who finish high school with minimal reading, math and communication skills will not be able to work effectively as part of a team, operate sophisticated machinery, solve problems or take initiative on behalf of customers. Simply put, if workers can do today's jobs – and tomorrow's – their companies will thrive. If they only do yesterday's jobs, sooner or later their companies will fail and unemployment will rise. For many employers, the most effective way to change the schools is to change what happens inside their own companies.

The domestic job market in our economies reflects intense international competition. The continuing need for structural adjustment and adaptation challenges all of us. The need is for a workforce capable of critical thinking and creative problem-solving. Yet, in some cases, we continue to educate youth for the smokestack industries of generations past.

Thus, we face a paradox of our own making. We have created economies that seek literate, technically trained and committed workers, while simultaneously we produce many young men and women who are semi-literate or functionally illiterate, unable to think critically and untrained in technical skills, hampered by high-risk lifestyles and alienated from the social mainstream. In my own country, unemployment rates for high school drop-outs are more than twice those for high school graduates. The few jobs for which these people qualify often pay too little to support a family.

What is left for these young men and women is a life on the edge of society. Those with minimal competencies will barely get by. The most poorly prepared will move in and out of crime, drug abuse or alcoholism. Some will be forced to depend on government assistance in one form or another – income maintenance, health care and housing. Many will pay little in taxes and will be able to contribute only little to social security or to caring for themselves in later years. We have found that:

- each year's class of drop-outs will, over their lifetime, cost the nation about $260 billion in lost earnings and foregone taxes;
- in a lifetime, a male high school dropout will earn $260,000 less than a high school graduate, and contribute $78,000 less in taxes. A female who does not finish high school will earn $200,000 less and contribute $60,000 less in taxes;
- unemployment rates for high school drop-outs are more than twice those of high school graduates. Between 1973 and 1986, young people who did not finish high school suffered a 42 per cent drop in annual earnings in constant 1986 dollars;
- each added year of secondary education reduces the probability of public welfare dependency in adulthood by 35 per cent.

So you see, a second paradox has to do with how we learn: success in the market-place increasingly depends on learning, yet most people do not know how to learn. Most of us engage in "single-loop" learning. To give a simple analogy: a thermostat that automatically turns on the heat whenever the temperature in a room drops below a certain predetermined point is a good example of single-loop learning. A thermostat that could ask "why am I set at 68 degrees?", and then explore whether or not some other temperature might more economically achieve the goal of heating the room would be engaging in "double-loop" learning. The point is that more and more jobs – no matter what the title – are becoming what might be called "knowledge work". People at all levels of the organisation must combine the mastery of some highly specialised technical expertise with the ability to work effectively in teams, form productive relationships with clients and customers, and critically reflect on and then change their own organisational practices. And the nuts and bolts of management – whether of high-powered consultants or service representatives, senior managers or factory technicians – increasingly consists of guiding and integrating the autonomous but interconnected work of highly skilled people.

Isaac Stern, the violinist and philosopher of music education, was once asked how it happened that all professional musicians could play the right notes in the right order, but some made beautiful music and some did not. "The important thing is not the notes", he replied, "it's the intervals between the notes". That is not only a wise comment about music, it is a piece of fundamental wisdom about education – and the ILO. The important thing about any process is not its isolated components; what makes them dynamic is the connections between and among them, connections made by people who understand the whole system, of which their own actions can only be a marginal part.

In the United States, we have undertaken a number of initiatives, with the cooperation of government, business, education and labour leaders, to address these issues. We have launched an important education strategy, "America 2000", designed to ensure that all our citizens acquire the basic tools needed to adapt their skills or acquire new skills throughout their careers. Employers are encouraged to invest in their workers and to reorganise work practices to make maximum use of skilled workers. Business, education and labour leaders have been brought together to define the skills and skill levels needed to obtain entry-level jobs and to earn a decent living. We fully endorse the idea that "A trained workforce is more productive and mobile and better able to adjust to new demands and new opportunities in the labour market".

The fact is that national competitiveness has become one of the central preoccupations of governments, employers and workers in every nation. The only meaningful concept of competitiveness at the national level is productivity – and that means education and training – the kind of "double-loop" learning I mentioned earlier. Productivity is the prime determinant of a nation's long-run standard of living; it is the root cause of national per capita income. Under conditions of structural adjustment, education and training have become increasingly the name of the game.

Beyond that, there is a personal satisfaction which comes from a lifetime of learning. Someone described what I mean when he recently wrote: "There are some needs that we as humans can satisfy and call it done. We can feel safe with an enjoyable but humble shelter and know that we will have enough food for tomorrow. There are other needs that can never be satisfied. The fact is that the more we get the more we want. When people understand love, the need is never completely satisfied. The more they get the more they give and need to give. Education is a similar human need. Some people find that learning just opens more doors of an insatiable appetite to know. Those who find pleasure in new ideas just keep discovering new ideas. I expect that the urge to know is the Fountain of Youth for many people. Those who can get up each day and learn something new and exciting will always be young".

The ILO has an important role to play as an integrator of tripartite experience and perspectives. The ascendancy of liberal democracy, the doctrine of individual freedom and popular sovereignty have made education and training all the more urgent as new markets, legal systems and organisational forms continue to develop.

If, as expected, "the business of business is increasingly education, and the business of education is work", then we all have much to do to prepare for the future.

Closing speeches

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now come to the last item on the agenda; in other words the closing speeches of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I call on the Vice-Presidents, Mr. Solórzano Martínez, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala, Mr. Decosterd, Employers' delegate, Switzerland, and Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya, to come up to the rostrum.

Original – Spanish: Mr. SOLORZANO MARTINEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala; Vice-President of the Conference) – May I start, Mr. President, by saying that it has been a great honour for me to work under your leadership and to be able to take part in this Conference by your side.

I think we have had a splendid Conference, where discussions have taken place in the best possible way, where we have achieved important resolutions and where, once again, we have justified the importance of our Organisation in the world context.

From that perspective and on behalf of my Government, I should like to conclude by saying that I express my thanks to all delegates, especially those from Latin America, for having nominated and elected me to the office of Government Vice-President. I wish you all a safe journey home and every success in your countries.

Original – French: Mr. DECOSTERD (Employers' delegate, Switzerland; Vice-President of the Conference) – Hundreds of speakers have respected the banal and sometimes derisory tradition in this Organisation expressing their thanks to the President.

But I assure you that I speak from the bottom of my heart when I say that greatly I appreciated the brilliant way in which you conducted the work of this Conference. You conducted without actually directing, in other words with a mastery of modern command.

I would also like to express my thanks to my fellow Vice-Presidents of the Conference for the excellent understanding and willingness to compromise which reigned throughout the three weeks of our discussion.

I should also, and above all, like to thank the Secretary-General and his team, and express my admiration for their devotion and motivation. Exemplary devotion it was, indeed. This was something that very much impressed me at a time when people are very keen on criticising public servants. And how could I fail to recall the cheerful efficiency of the Clerk of the Conference? On behalf of all Employer delegates I should like to thank all of those whom one does not see in this hall, those who have worked night and day, and even Saturdays and Sundays to ensure that we will be able to finish the Conference on time.

In just two words then, I can say that as a worker in this Organisation, I experienced the same pleasure that too few workers experience in day-to-day life, that is the pleasure of being well-guided and the pleasure of seeing guidance come from above.

It is only vain people who think that success depends on the personal aptitudes of the individual. Very often it comes from a hazardous combination of circumstances, and so it was in my case when my Employer colleagues appointed me as Vice-President of this Conference. I consider this a great honour and I would like to thank them publicly.

However, these circumstances also had an unfortunate side because never before this year have I so wished to speak in the general debate. Unable to do so before now, on the road that leads to democracy, I would like to make one or two comments, quite simply because I was lucky enough to be born in a country which has always known a system of democracy.

Democracy is an extremely fragile institution. You cannot simply decree it overnight as you can dictatorships. It can only be born and developed from the base upwards, if you know how to care for it.

Swiss democracy, born 700 years ago from the will of three men, encouraged by a few thousands of peasants and farmers, never spared Switzerland from social conflicts or civil and other wars, nor from famine, poverty or intolerable unemployment. But, nevertheless, over 700 years it has enabled this country to overcome all its major crises because there was a democratic spirit, there was a determined will to search for compromise.

Democracy implies, above all, a change in attitude, and that is the most difficult thing. An attitude which recognises that free men do not only enjoy rights, but that they must assume duties. This civic spirit is really the first collective agreement, as it were, between individuals or groups from the village structure upwards. And the willingness to compromise always prevails over individual power.

Tripartism, and this is my final point, is the initial tangible manifestation of freedom, negotiation and democracy. But we have to agree on the definition of the term tripartism, and ensure that it is authentic tripartism and not just some kind of masquerade. In this connection, I would like to recall the communication made to this Conference on the inquiry undertaken by the International Organisation of Employers into the conditions in which delegates of tripartite committees participate in this Conference.

I think that we should remember, ladies and gentlemen, that amongst you there are 37 governments which are still not discharging the obligation to pay for the travel and subsistence expenses for delegates attending this Conference. This point alone demonstrates, as the Director-General recalled this morning, that when it comes to major declarations of principles and day-to-day realities, there is still a huge cleavage, an abyss, between the two which is a source of major concern to us. This is something that we have to try and improve.

So this is my state of mind as this session of the Conference ends. I very much hope that, in the future, the path taken towards democracy and a market economy will give the individual a greater opportunity to be a human being, in other words, a citizen, a worker, a consumer, and that this will give our Organisation the full significance conferred upon it by the Declaration of Philadelphia – in other words to contribute to enhancing the dignity of man at work.

Mr. MUGALLA (Workers' delegate, Kenya; Vice-President of the Conference) – In the first place, Mr. President, I would like to address to you my congratulations on the manner in which you have presided over this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The positive results that have been reac – and I believe they are considerable – are due in no small part to you, and to the skill, experience, and good humour that you brought to the difficult job of the past weeks. You have more than justified the confidence placed in you by the Conference, and done great credit to your country.

At the same time I wish to place on record my sincere gratitude to my fellow Vice-Presidents, Mr. Solórzano Martínez and Mr. Decosterd, for the friendship and cooperation they showed in carrying out the duties that we shared. It was a pleasure, as well as an honour, to work with them.

Indeed, I think that this session of the Conference will be remembered particularly for the spirit of cooperation demonstrated by representatives from all groups in the search for consensus. They have concentrated on the real objective of the ILO – bettering the lives of working people everywhere – and contributed substantially to their advancement.

In particular, I think it is worth underlining the manner in which this session of the Conference has demonstrated the continuing validity of the standard-setting and supervising functions that are at the heart of the ILO's mandate. In my group, we regard the newly adopted Convention on workers' claims in the event of insolvency as a major achievement. It offers an important means for the protection of those who are most adversely affected by the workings of market forces. As such, it can be a significant component of the social dimension that needs to be built into market-based systems. But for this to be realised it has to be ratified, and I would urge all member States to give early and positive consideration to that basic question.

The Conference has also laid the foundations for the adoption next year of further instruments that can help us prevent the type of industrial disaster of which we have been made so tragically aware in recent years. There can be no doubting the value of those standards and I venture to express the hope that all delegates will contribute actively to their completion at our next session.

Of course, the usefulness of all international labour Conventions, new and old, depends wholly on their effective application and it is that simple fact that makes the work of our Application of Standards Committee so significant. The aim of its work is to encourage and assist governments in meeting their obligations under ratified standards and it is critical to the credibility of the ILO that those governments accept its authoritative recommendations and make genuine efforts to act upon them.

In addition to its standards-related activities, the Conference has also reached substantive conclusions as a result of the general discussion on human resources development which will provide valuable guidance for the Organisation's future work in this field. Perhaps we can never be reminded too often that economic development should always be channelled to the satisfaction of human needs and welfare, and not otherwise.

Similarly, the Resolutions Committee has surpassed itself this year by presenting three texts for adoption. Each of them provides important insight and direction, in respect of enterprise development, employment development, or migrant workers' rights. They deserve to be studied carefully in each of our countries and will doubtless be the subject of detailed Governing Body attention in the near future.

The conclusions adopted concerning the fight against apartheid were, as we all know, the result of long and intensive negotiations. They show that the ILO and its constituents are, indeed, ready to walk the last mile with the oppressed people of South Africa as Nelson Mandela exhorted us to do. Every one of us looks forward to the day when there will be no need to convene the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. But that will only be when apartheid is finally and irrevocably abolished. Recent evens only confirm that we must not let up short of that goal.

Under your leadership, Mr. President, this session of the Conference has done its job well. That is cause for satisfaction – but not for complacency – because the tasks before the ILO are immense and the means at its disposal limited. Nevertheless, those who will, in the coming months, continue the task of assessing ways of improving the functioning of the Conference would do well to reflect on the achievements of this session. They must be sure that nothing that is of such particular and unique value in this institution is compromised in the name of short-term economy or out of desire for innovation for its own sake.

My last word is for my brothers and sisters in the Workers' group. I thank them for the honour they have done me by electing me to the vice-presidency of this session of the Conference. I have done all in my power to serve them, and you all, to the best of my capacities. I wish each of you a safe journey home.

Original – French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – As is the case every year as the session of the conference draws to an end it will have added a number of stones to the edifice of the International Labour Organisation. Once again, the Conference carried on in a spririt of tripartism, which is at the same time its hallmark and its strength in the United Nations system.

The success of this 79th Session is very much thanks to you, Mr. President.

I should like to express our gratitude to you for it. You have placed at the service of the Conference your experience, your diplomacy and a special kind of authority, which you so discreetly used in leading our debate. I would also like to thank your Vice-Presidents who formed a remarkable team with you and who assisted you so capably.

Permit me also to thank the Chairmen, Vice-Chairmen and reporters of the Conference Committees. If we take stock of the Conference's achievements, we see quite clearly that the work which was done day after day, and in some cases even evening after evening, made it possible for us to reach an outcome of which we can be proud.

Allow me also to thank all my colleagues. In this vast ship, there are those who are on the bridge and those who are in the engine room, those who interpret, those who translate, those who print, those who distribute documents, those who try to make your life a little easier during the course of these three weeks. You may not see them, but I believe we need them all. They have all greatly appreciated the kind words you have addressed to them, as indeed have I.

Before finishing, Mr. President, I should just like to wish you, the other Officers of the Conference and each of the delegates a safe return home. May you bear with you the message of hope of the International Labour Organisation, so that it may thrive in your countries. Finally, Mr. President, it is a tradition that the Secretary-General of the Conference should hand over, on behalf of all the delegates of the Conference, the gavel which you have been using to lead our debates. I would like to give it to you as a reminder of the authority you exercised during this session of the Conference. I ask you to accept it as a token of our esteem, on behalf of all those here present.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – During the weeks of this session of the Conference, dozens of eminent speakers have come up to this rostrum to pay well-deserved homage to the Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO. It has been called, and I am sure not just out of politeness, an excellent Report.

So far as I am concerned I would venture to describe it differently because it is one of the most brilliant reports that has been submitted in the course of the long history of the Conference. It is a remarkable document from many points of view and therefore I intend to keep it in my library in order to be able to reread it from time to time, rediscover its rich content and the different lessons it contains and consider the new paths upon which it invites us to reflect.

Indeed this is quite a remarkable text because of its fairness and the eloquence it employs to defend democratic values. The rule of law and human rights are at the heart of all the discussions we have held in this plenary. For this reason, the Report is above all a tribute to democracy and has grasped the eternal values of freedom and justice.

The Report on the other hand includes a rigorous, clear and perspicacious analysis of the vastly different contexts within which democratisation is taking place, sometimes hesitantly, being consolidated in others cases. Sometimes it is taking place with great difficulty. Elsewhere democracy goes through a process of renewal and adapts itself. Even in the oldest democracies of industrialised countries new challenges need to be faced.

For these reasons the Report is really a kind of kaleidoscope of our world. It clearly distinguishes the different situations of various kinds of economy and clearly emphasises the different priorities set by different countries of different regions (and the nuances within them) and explains the differing speeds of the democratisation processes. It wastes no time in recalling two basis truths-democratic values are universal, when it comes to freedom and justice, of course, but always are determined by the cultural characteristics of each people, and secondly, democracy is a piece of work which is never finished and consequently requires constant perserverence when building it.

The reply we have heard from the delegates on the objective of the democratisation of society is unanimous. I do not doubt the sincerity of this reply and the consensus surrounding it but now, however, at this very moment when this wind of democracy is blowing, we must not commit the fatal error of considering democratisation as being a kind of fashion which will change at the end of the season. Nor should we succumb to the fatal illusion that political democracy can exist without economic and social democracy.

I think that that concept of democracy has been understood in all of its facets. Therefore I think that there is no point in repeating the ideas that I have already been able to put forward to you in my introductory statement to this session of the Conference. These ideas were simply a modest contribution of mine to the ardent appeal for democracy launched by the Director-General's Report.

This Report opened and closed with a fundamental question as to what the ILO has to do in the future and how we can all work together for the sake of democracy and social justice. Now we have carefully listened to the statements.

There have been about 300 different speakers who spoke on the matter and we have in our memories the reply given to us by the Director-General this morning. Now I should like to make one or two further points on this issue.

Our Organisation is basically a technical one, I would go as far as saying that it cannot work effectively if we do not take into account the political context that it is working in. The problems of work, of economic development and social justice cannot be resolved outside the framework of true democracy, in the full acceptance and broadest sense of the term.

It is not for the ILO to intervene in political issues nor in institutional matters within the various political systems. However, it is certainly incumbent on the ILO to, firstly, make a specific contribution to the formation of the democratic values that lay the foundations for and encourage the growth of tripartism and social dialogue, which can take place between trade unions and employers or between both sides of industry and governments.

If tripartism is a very special aspect of this Organisation, and if social democracy is an indispensable addition to political and economic democracy, as we have often stressed, then I think that it is perfectly logical to say that the essential task before us over the coming years, the foundation that will allow us to reach gradual solutions to the immense problems we are now facing, is the cooperation that the ILO can provide in this area. Cooperation, above all, with the member States that are taking their first steps down the path towards political democracy, because they have been marked by long years of single-party systems and by the ambiguity of partisans', governmental, trade union and employers' rules. I think therefore that it is very important for them to be able to set up training programmes in democratic values and technical training programmes in the establishment of institutions and processes which will lead to social dialogue, with account begin taken of the specific characteristics of each situation. But we are not just talking about these countries. There are also other countries where democracy seems to be advancing. In these countries the challenge of transition from a centrally planned economy to a socially oriented market economy or the problems of restructuring resulting from the need to adapt the subsistence economies to alleviate the burden of public debt, or to introduce new technologies – or many other factors – make it equally indispensable for change to be based on the exchange of information and consultation, collective bargaining or tripartite concensus.

The beneficiaries of these cooperation programmes should thus be the ministries of the member States which bear social responsibility within the specific field of the ILO's mandate; but also, of course, the trade unions and employers' organisations, enterprises and cooperatives.

In this priority context of the development of healthy industrial relations, which can gradually improve working conditions or the preparation and updating of labour legislation which will guarantee the basic rights of workers, the ILO has a unique authority and unique experience. It must exercise and develop that authority and that experience. I believe that it can do so, above all, through its major programmes of activities for trade unions and employers. But it should also support the training of officials in the social ministries of member States so that they can become the first guarantors of the independence of each party and promote dialogue with trade union and employers' representatives in a relationship which is no longer based on the confrontation of interests and the divergence of positions. If it is not always possible to achieve consensus, at least there should be a better mutual understanding of the arguments advanced by both sides.

If I insist on this aspect of the democratisation of occupational relations and tripartite consensus, it is because I believe that the other major and noble objectives which have been defined as priorities for the coming years will be difficult to achieve without the joint efforts of governments, trade unions, employers' organisations and other free institutions which are now emerging from civil society and whose legitimate objectives also concern the achievement of this democratisation.

I have to pay tribute to the Governing Body of the ILO for the report which its Chairman, Mr. Chotard, has submitted to the plenary and which clearly sets forth the reasons for the choice of the other two priorities, namely the fight against poverty and the better protection of workers.

These will, indeed, require the preparation and implementation of programmes for employment promotion, vocational training, social security, human resources development, improved occupational safety and health, the protection of migrants, the fight against discrimination and the exploitation of child labour.

But is it not also true that all these questions are inter-related and should not therefore be looked at and dealt with on an isolated basis? This seems to me obvious. If we look at the problem of structural readjustment in enterprises or sectors of activity, we can understand very clearly the need to give a coherent and integrated basis to cooperation programmes.

The health of enterprises and economies often makes it necessary to suppress or transform workplaces, retrain workers with out-of-date skills, and change antiquated management methods. If we adopt a purely technocratic approach or solutions which are exclusively economic, not only will we run the risk of not solving the problems caused by these indispensable changes but we may also create more poverty, more unemployment and more social marginalisation. These are always the seeds of violence. And violence, whatever its cause, undermines political democracy, is an obstacles to economic democracy and destroys social democracy.

It is therefore essential for technical cooperation projects to be concluded in consultation with each member State on the basis of an internal dialogue between the respective governments, trade unions and employers' organisations. And it is equally important for these programmes to encompass a comprehensive vision of social and economic questions, within each cultural and political context; they must be formulated at the appropriate moment, promoted in a multi-disciplinary manner and are accompanied in the field with flexibility and the necessary capacity to adapt and make changes as the occasion arises.

It is not difficult to see that all this will lead to a very complex set of relationships. This is why it is important for these to be well-conceived and applied between the various governmental departments in each State, between these departments and the social partners and between the social partners and other social institutions – such as schools, parents' associations, cooperatives, environmental organisations, consumers' organisations, etc. When we turn, for example, to occupational training programmes we must not separate them from the structure of the official or private education of systems existing in each country. In the same way the fight against child labour should not be separated from the creation of productive and economic employment enabling workers to support their families with dignity and their children to enjoy the elementary right to education.

This increasingly close connection between economic, financial, social, educational, environmental and many other problems requires an overall vision which highlights their interdependence.

This basically is the reason why the ILO, which has always been at the forefront when fighting for social justice, must continue to lead this struggle. The Organisation has to readjust its methods of functioning, to get to the heart of each specific situation and make its organisational structures flexible enough to further enrich the field within which it works so that it can better meet the needs of its various constituents, with increasing speed and credibility.

These changes presuppose the training and motivation of its own officials who are the strength, the image and the voice of ILO technical cooperation. This means that there has to be an appropriate strategy for developing human resources within the Organisation. I have no doubt that this will be achieved and gradually put into practice.

I have already had an opportunity to describe this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference as one of tranquility and efficiency. There are excellent reasons to congratulate the delegates for that. Tranquility does not mean inaction or conformity. It is, on the contrary, a climate of tranquillity which facilitates serious reflection and in which activities are planned in a rational manner and effective results are achieved.

The proof of this is the very fruitful debates on the Reports of the Director-General and the Governing Body which have taken place in the plenary.

Proof is also found in the excellent work produced by the committees and in the adoption of the new Convention concerning the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, with its Recommendation. I should like to pay tribute to all of the chairmen and vice-chairmen and the members of the committees and the representatives of the Secretary-General in these committees, because they have all fully participated in the prestigious work that has taken place.

Proof can also be found in the dispassionate atmosphere in which the special sitting on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories took place and also the debates on apartheid, which were always difficult but disciplined and for which the timetables were always respected.

And, finally, what better proof than the note worthy but difficult-to-resume statement made by President Chiluba who honoured us with his presence at the Conference?

So, a Conference therefore of tranquility, but also a Conference of efficiency, efficiency which is due to you all, beginning with the Vice-Presidents of the Conference, who have given me such firm support, then the delegates, the technical advisers, our illustrious Secretary-General and his senior colleagues and the huge number of anonymous of officials who have devoted themselves at all times of day and night to ensure that everthing should work effectively and rapidly. I should like to express my deep gratitude to all of you, not forgetting the Portuguese-language interpreters who were used for the first time at this session of the Conference, both in plenary and in the committees, to the justifiable satisfaction of those of us representing the seven Portuguese-speaking countries.

May I express my particular thanks also to the Chairman and Vice-Chairmen of the Selection Committee for the new and effective procedure which was inaugurated this year? This system has proved highly efficient and has allowed us to avoid long meetings.

So, we have come to the very last minutes of this Conference. The President passes on, the Conference will continue next year. What shall I say at this last moment?

When I spoke at the opening sitting, I did not hide the major concerns that weigh on us all. Consequently, our response to the problems of social justice, whether old or new, cannot be utopian, which would lead us to disaster. Nor can we allow ourselves to be deluded by some kind of mirage to believe that tomorrow we shall be living in a better world. We must be realistic, pragmatic, combative but lucid, in the eternal fight for human society.

Yet, precisely because we are human beings and not gods, and precisely because we are human beings and not working machines, we have a soul.

Allow me, then, to end my final message by quoting a line from a singer of my country that says "when a man dreams, the world advances".

I should like to wish all of you an excellent journey home to your respective countries.

I now solemnly declare the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

However, these increases have quickly been outstripped by rises in the cost of living. A social protection concept is currently being drawn up by the Republic's Government. This work has highlighted a number of deficiencies in the social standards of our Republic and the specific situation it now faces. It is therefore extremely important first and foremost to earmark a minimum budget for social programmes, taking into account the various social and demographic groups. Of course, we know that the new concept should not mean that everyone receives an equal share from the distribution system and from social benefits. It is thus important that we make as extensive use as possible of international experience by adapting it to our country's specific case. Our job now is to derive legislative and economic principles to set the parameters of our social protection system. Before concluding I would like to emphasise that one of the most difficult tasks facing the trade unions will be to earn the trust of the workers. Already, existing trade unions are introducing reforms, and new trade unions have been established. We believe it is essential to guarantee freedom of association if the trade union movement is to develop. Thanks to the right of legislative initiative, we have brought before the Supreme Council a draft law which guarantees freedom of association, including certain basic rights of workers, such as the right to strike. We shall make every effort to see this law through the adoption process, as it establishes the conditions required for the development of a democratically based trade union movement. I should like to make one last remark before concluding. Mr. Hansenne has quite rightly noted that no sooner is political freedom established than the population feels more destitute than ever, since reactionary forces made use of their poverty for their own ends. I call on the International Labour Organisation to do everything possible to assist the countries that recently shed totalitarianism, so as to avoid a rebirth of dictatorship."
23	19	Right-hand column, 4th and 6th full paragraphs. The acronym of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council was mistakenly indicated as SATU instead of SATUCC.
	22	Right-hand column, 5th full paragraph, 2nd sentence should read: "The union associations and movements promoting human rights and peace are, with the Churches, the architects of a climate of confidence in South Africa."
24	1	Paragraph 3, line 4, the name of the Employers' member (France) should read Mr. G. SIMONNET.
	5	Paragraph 47, line 11, replace "remarked" by "stated".
	9	Paragraph 94, line 16, after "technology", replace "of" by "or".
	14	Point 28 (2), 2nd line, for "subpoint (1)" read "point 28 (1)".

CONVENTION CONCERNING THE PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS IN THE EVENT OF THE INSOLVENCY OF THEIR EMPLOYER

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 79th Session on 3 June 1992, and

Stressing the importance of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer and recalling the provisions on this subject in Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, and Article 11 of the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925, and

Noting that, since the adoption of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, greater value has been placed on the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and that, because of the social and economic consequences of insolvency, efforts should be made where possible to rehabilitate enterprises and safeguard employment, and

Noting that since the adoption of the aforementioned standards, significant developments have taken place in the law and practice of many Members which have improved the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of their employer, and considering that it would be timely for the Conference to adopt new standards on the subject of workers' claims, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

adopts this twenty-third day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two the following Convention, which may be cited as the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992.

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

1. For the purposes of this Convention, the term "insolvency" refers to situations in which, in accordance with national law and practice, proceedings have been opened relating to an employer's assets with a view to the collective reimbursement of its creditors.

2. For the purposes of this Convention, a Member may extend the term "insolvency" to other situations in which workers' claims cannot be paid by reason of the financial situation of the employer, for example where the amount of the employer's assets is recognised as being insufficient to justify the opening of insolvency proceedings.

3. The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in paragraph 1 above shall be determined by national laws, regulations or practice.

Article 2

The provisions of this Convention shall be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice.

Article 3

1. A Member which ratifies this Convention shall accept either the obligations of Part II, providing for the protection of workers' claims by means of a privilege, or the obligations of Part III, providing for the protection of workers' claims by a

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LA PROTECTION DES CRÉANCES DES TRAVAILLEURS EN CAS D'INSOLVABILITÉ DE LEUR EMPLOYEUR

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 3 juin 1992 en sa soixante-dix-neuvième session;

Soulignant l'importance de la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur et rappelant les dispositions y relatives de l'article 11 de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949, et de l'article 11 de la convention sur la réparation des accidents du travail, 1925;

Notant que, depuis l'adoption de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949, une plus grande importance a été accordée au redressement des entreprises insolvables et que, compte tenu des conséquences sociales et économiques de l'insolvabilité, des efforts devraient être faits autant que possible pour redresser les entreprises et sauvegarder l'emploi;

Notant que, depuis l'adoption desdites normes, d'importants développements ont eu lieu dans la législation et la pratique de nombreux Membres dans le sens d'une amélioration de la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, et considérant qu'il serait opportun que la Conférence adopte de nouvelles normes relatives aux créances des travailleurs;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt-troisième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-douze, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, 1992.

PARTIE I. DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES

Article 1

1. Aux fins de la présente convention, le terme «insolvabilité» désigne les situations où, en conformité avec la législation et la pratique nationales, une procédure portant sur les actifs d'un employeur et tendant à rembourser collectivement ses créanciers a été ouverte.

2. Aux fins de la présente convention, tout Membre peut étendre le terme «insolvabilité» à d'autres situations où les créances des travailleurs ne peuvent être payées en raison de la situation financière de l'employeur, par exemple lorsque le montant des actifs de l'employeur est reconnu comme étant insuffisant pour justifier l'ouverture d'une procédure d'insolvabilité.

3. La mesure dans laquelle les actifs d'un employeur sont assujettis aux procédures mentionnées au paragraphe 1 sera déterminée par la législation ou la pratique nationale.

Article 2

Les dispositions de la présente convention doivent être appliquées par voie de législation ou par tous autres moyens conformes à la pratique nationale.

Article 3

1. Tout Membre qui ratifie la présente convention doit accepter soit les obligations de la partie II, prévoyant la protection des créances des travailleurs au moyen d'un privilège, soit les obligations de la partie III, prévoyant la protection guarantee institution, or the obligations of both Parts. This choice shall be indicated in a declaration accompanying its ratification.

2. A Member which has initially accepted only Part II or only Part III of this Convention may thereafter, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, extend its acceptance to the other Part.

3. A Member which accepts the obligations of both Parts of this Convention may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, limit the application of Part III to certain categories of workers and to certain branches of economic activity. Such limitations shall be specified in the declaration of acceptance.

4. A Member which has limited its acceptance of the obligations of Part III in accordance with paragraph 3 above shall, in its first report under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, give the reasons for limiting its acceptance. In subsequent reports it shall provide information on any extension of the protection under Part III of this Convention to other categories of workers or other branches of economic activity.

5. A Member which has accepted the obligations of Parts II and III of this Convention may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, exclude from the application of Part II those claims which are protected pursuant to Part III.

6. Acceptance by a Member of the obligations of Part II of this Convention shall ipso jure involve the termination of its obligations under Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949.

7. A Member which has accepted only the obligations of Part III of this Convention may, by a declaration communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, terminate its obligations under Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, in respect of those claims which are protected pursuant to Part III.

1. Subject to the exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 below, and to any limitations specified in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 3, this Convention shall apply to all employees and to all branches of economic activity.

2. The competent authority, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, may exclude from Part II, Part III or both Parts of this Convention specific categories of workers, in particular public employees, by reason of the particular nature of their employment relationship, or if there are other types of guarantee affording them protection equivalent to that provided by the Convention.

3. A Member availing itself of the exceptions provided for in paragraph 2 above shall, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, provide information on such exceptions, giving the reasons therefor.

PART II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

Article 5

In the event of an employer's insolvency, workers' claims arising out of their employment shall be protected by a privilege so that they are paid out of the assets of the insolvent employer before non-privileged creditors can be paid their share.

des créances des travailleurs par une institution de garantie, soit les obligations des parties II et III. Ce choix doit être indiqué dans une déclaration accompagnant la ratification.

2. Tout Membre qui n'a accepté initialement que les obligations de la partie II ou de la partie III de la présente convention peut, par la suite, par une déclaration communiquée au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail, étendre son acceptation à l'autre partie.

3. Tout Membre qui accepte les obligations des deux parties de la présente convention peut, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, limiter l'application de la partie III à certaines catégories de travailleurs et à certaines branches d'activité économique; cette limitation doit être spécifiée dans la déclaration d'acceptation.

4. Tout Membre ayant limité son acceptation des obligations de la partie III conformément au paragraphe précédent doit, dans le premier rapport qu'il soumet conformément à l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, donner les raisons pour lesquelles il a limité son acceptation. Dans les rapports ultérieurs, il devra fournir des informations relatives à l'extension éventuelle de la protection résultant de la partie III de la convention à d'autres catégories de travailleurs ou à d'autres branches d'activité économique.

5. Tout Membre qui a accepté les obligations des parties II et III de la présente convention peut, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, exclure de l'application de la partie II les créances protégées en vertu de la partie III.

6. L'acceptation par un Membre des obligations de la partie II de la présente convention met fin de plein droit aux obligations découlant pour lui de l'article 11 de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949.

7. Tout Membre qui n'a accepté que les obligations de la partie III de la présente convention peut, par une déclaration communiquée au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail, mettre fin aux obligations découlant pour lui de l'article 11 de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949, pour ce qui est des créances protégées en vertu de la partie III.

1. Sous réserve des exceptions prévues au paragraphe suivant et, le cas échéant, des limitations introduites conformément à l'article 3, paragraphe 3, la présente convention s'applique à tous les travailleurs salariés et à toutes les branches d'activité économique.

2. L'autorité compétente peut, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, exclure de la partie II ou de la partie III, ou des deux parties, de la présente convention, des catégories déterminées de travailleurs, en particulier les agents publics, en raison de la nature particulière de leur relation d'emploi, ou s'il existe d'autres garanties qui leur offrent une protection équivalant à celle résultant de la convention.

3. Tout Membre qui se prévaut des exceptions prévues au paragraphe précédent doit, dans ses rapports au titre de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, fournir des informations sur ces exceptions et en donner les raisons.

Partie II. Protection des créances des travailleurs au moyen d'un privilège

CRÉANCES PROTÉGÉES

Article 5

En cas d'insolvabilité d'un employeur, les créances des travailleurs au titre de leur emploi doivent être protégées par un privilège, de sorte qu'elles soient payées sur les actifs de l'employeur insolvable avant que les créanciers non privilégiés puissent se faire payer leur quote-part.

Article 6

The privilege shall cover at least:

(a) the workers' claims for wages relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) the workers' claims for amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment; and

(d) severance pay due to workers upon termination of their employment.

LIMITATIONS

Article 7

1. National laws or regulations may limit the protection by privilege of workers' claims to a prescribed amount, which shall not be below a socially acceptable level.

2. Where the privilege afforded to workers' claims is so limited, the prescribed amount shall be adjusted as necessary so as to maintain its value.

RANK OF PRIVILEGE

Article 8

1. National laws or regulations shall give workers' claims a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims, and in particular those of the State and the social security system.

2. However, where workers' claims are protected by a guarantee institution in accordance with Part III of this Convention, the claims so protected may be given a lower rank of privilege than those of the State and the social security system.

PART III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Article 9

The payment of workers' claims against their employer arising out of their employment shall be guaranteed through a guarantee institution when payment cannot be made by the employer because of insolvency.

Article 10

In giving effect to this Part of the Convention, a Member may, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, adopt appropriate measures for the purpose of preventing possible abuse.

Article 11

1. The organisation, management, operation and financing of wage guarantee institutions shall be determined pursuant to Article 2.

Article 6

Le privilège doit porter au moins sur les créances des travailleurs:

a) au titre des salaires afférents à une période déterminée, qui ne doit pas être inférieure à trois mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi;

b) au titre des congés payés dus en raison du travail effectué dans le courant de l'année dans laquelle est survenue l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi, ainsi que dans l'année précédente;

c) au titre des montants dus pour d'autres absences rémunérées afférentes à une période déterminée, qui ne doit pas être inférieure à trois mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi, et

d) au titre d'indemnités de départ qui sont dues aux travailleurs à l'occasion de la cessation de la relation d'emploi.

LIMITATIONS

Article 7

1. La législation nationale peut limiter l'étendue du privilège des créances des travailleurs à un montant prescrit qui ne doit pas être inférieur à un seuil socialement acceptable.

2. Lorsque le privilège des créances des travailleurs est ainsi limité, ce montant doit être ajusté en tant que de besoin pour en maintenir la valeur.

RANG DU PRIVILÈGE

Article 8

1. La législation nationale doit placer les créances des travailleurs à un rang de privilège plus élevé que la plupart des autres créances privilégiées, et en particulier celles de l'Etat et de la sécurité sociale.

2. Toutefois, lorsque les créances des travailleurs sont protégées par une institution de garantie conformément à la partie III de la présente convention, les créances ainsi protégées peuvent être placées à un rang de privilège moins élevé que celles de l'Etat et de la sécurité sociale.

PARTIE III. PROTECTION DES CRÉANCES DES TRAVAILLEURS PAR UNE INSTITUTION DE GARANTIE

PRINCIPES GÉNÉRAUX

Article 9

Le paiement des créances des travailleurs à l'égard de leur employeur, au titre de leur emploi, doit être garanti par l'intermédiaire d'une institution de garantie lorsqu'il ne peut être effectué par l'employeur en raison de son insolvabilité.

Article 10

Dans la mise en œuvre de la présente partie de la convention, tout Membre peut, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, adopter les mesures appropriées pour éviter les abus possibles.

Article 11

1. Les modalités d'organisation, de gestion, de fonctionnement et de financement des institutions de garantie doivent être déterminées conformément à l'article 2.

2. The preceding paragraph shall not prevent a Member, in accordance with its particular characteristics and needs, from allowing insurance companies to provide the protection referred to in Article 9, as long as they offer sufficient guarantees.

CLAIMS PROTECTED BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

The workers' claims protected pursuant to this Part of the Convention shall include at least:

(a) the workers' claims for wages relating to a prescribed period, which shall not be less than eight weeks, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) the workers' claims for holiday pay due as a result of work performed during a prescribed period, which shall not be less than six months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Le paragraphe précédent n'empêche pas un Membre, conformément à ses caractéristiques et ses besoins, de permettre à des compagnies d'assurance de fournir la protection visée à l'article 9, pourvu qu'elles présentent les garanties suffisantes.

CRÉANCES PROTÉGÉES PAR UNE INSTITUTION DE GARANTIE

Article 12

Les créances des travailleurs protégées en vertu de la présente partie de la convention doivent comprendre au moins:

Recommendation 180

RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING THE PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS IN THE EVENT OF THE INSOLVENCY OF THEIR EMPLOYER

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 79th Session on 3 June 1992, and

Stressing the importance of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer and recalling the provisions on this subject in Article 11 of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, and Article 11 of the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925, and

Noting that, since the adoption of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949, greater value has been given to the rehabilitation of insolvent enterprises and that, because of the social and economic consequences of insolvency, efforts should be made where possible to rehabilitate enterprises and safeguard employment, and

Noting that since the adoption of the aforementioned standards, significant developments have taken place in the law and practice of many Members which have improved the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, and considering that it would be timely for the Conference to adopt new standards on the subject of workers' claims, and

Recognising that guarantee institutions, if properly designed, afford greater protection of workers' claims, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

adopts this twenty-third day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Recommendation, 1992.

I. DEFINITIONS AND METHODS OF APPLICATION

1. (1) For the purposes of this Recommendation, the term "insolvency" refers to situations in which, in accordance with national law and practice, proceedings have been opened relating to an employer's assets with a view to the collective reimbursement of its creditors.

(2) For the purposes of this Recommendation, Members may extend the term "insolvency" to other situations in which workers' claims cannot be paid by reason of the financial situation of the employer, and in particular to the following:

(a) where the enterprise has closed down or ceased its activities or is voluntarily wound up;

(b) where the amount of the employer's assets is insufficient to justify the opening of insolvency proceedings;

(c) where, in the course of proceedings to recover a worker's claim arising out of employment, it is found that the employer has no assets or that these are insufficient to pay the debt in question;

(d) where the employer has died and his or her assets have been placed in the hands of an administrator and the amounts due cannot be paid out of the estate.

(3) The extent to which an employer's assets are subject to the proceedings referred to in subparagraph (1) should be determined by national laws, regulations or practice.

RECOMMANDATION CONCERNANT LA PROTECTION DES CRÉANCES DES TRAVAILLEURS EN CAS D'INSOLVABILITÉ DE LEUR EMPLOYEUR

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 3 juin 1992, en sa soixante-dix-neuvième session;

Soulignant l'importance de la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur et rappelant les dispositions y relatives de l'article 11 de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949, et de l'article 11 de la convention sur la réparation des accidents du travail, 1925;

Notant que, depuis l'adoption de la convention sur la protection du salaire, 1949, une plus grande importance a été accordée au redressement des entreprises insolvables et que, compte tenu des conséquences sociales et économiques de l'insolvabilité, des efforts devraient être faits autant que possible pour redresser les entreprises et sauvegarder l'emploi;

Notant que, depuis l'adoption desdites normes, d'importants développements ont eu lieu dans la législation et la pratique de nombreux Membres dans le sens d'une amélioration de la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, et considérant qu'il serait opportun que la Conférence adopte de nouvelles normes relatives aux créances des travailleurs;

Reconnaissant que des institutions de garantie, si elles sont correctement conçues, offrent une protection plus large aux créances des travailleurs;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation complétant la convention sur la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, 1992, adopte, ce vingt-troisième jour de juin 1992, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur la protection des créances des travailleurs en cas d'insolvabilité de leur employeur, 1992.

I. DÉFINITIONS ET MÉTHODES D'APPLICATION

(2) Aux fins de la présente recommandation, les Membres peuvent étendre le terme «insolvabilité» à d'autres situations où les créances des travailleurs ne peuvent être payées en raison de la situation financière de l'employeur, notamment:

a) lorsque l'entreprise est fermée ou que ses activités ont cessé, ou qu'elle est liquidée volontairement;

b) lorsque le montant des actifs de l'employeur est insuffisant pour justifier l'ouverture d'une procédure d'insolvabilité;

c) lorsque la créance d'un travailleur, au titre de son emploi, est en instance de recouvrement et qu'il est constaté que l'employeur n'a pas d'actifs ou que ceux-ci sont insuffisants pour acquitter la dette en question;

d) lorsque l'employeur est décédé, que son patrimoine a été remis à un administrateur et que les montants dus ne peuvent être payés au moyen de l'actif successoral.

(3) La mesure dans laquelle les actifs d'un employeur sont sujets au sous-paragraphe (1) devrait être déterminée par la législation ou la pratique nationale.

2. The provisions of this Recommendation may be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice.

II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY MEANS OF A PRIVILEGE

PROTECTED CLAIMS

3. (1) The protection afforded by a privilege should cover the following claims:

(a) wages, overtime pay, commissions and other forms of remuneration relating to work performed during a prescribed period prior to the insolvency or prior to termination of the employment. This period should be fixed by national laws or regulations and should not be less than 12 months;

(b) holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence, end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescribed period, which should not be less than 12 months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(d) payments due in lieu of notice of termination of employment;

(e) severance pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other payments due to workers upon termination of their employment;

(f) compensation payable directly by the employer in respect of occupational accidents and diseases.

(2) The protection afforded by a privilege might cover the following claims:

(a) contributions due in respect of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(b) contributions due in respect of private, occupational, inter-occupational or enterprise social protection schemes independent of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(c) benefits to which the workers were entitled prior to the insolvency by virtue of their participation in enterprise social protection schemes and which are payable by the employer.

(3) Claims enumerated in subparagraphs (1) and (2) that have been awarded to a worker through an adjudication or arbitration within 12 months prior to the insolvency should be covered by the privilege regardless of the time-limits specified in those subparagraphs.

LIMITATIONS

4. Where the amount of the claim protected by a privilege is limited by national laws or regulations, in order that this amount should not fall below a socially acceptable level it should take into account variables such as the minimum wage, the part of the wage which is unattachable, the wage on which social security contributions are based or the average wage in industry.

2. Les dispositions de la présente recommandation peuvent être appliquées par voie de législation ou par tous autres moyens conformes à la pratique nationale.

II. PROTECTION DES CRÉANCES DES TRAVAILLEURS AU MOYEN D'UN PRIVILÈGE

CRÉANCES PROTÉGÉES

3. (1) La protection conférée par un privilège devrait couvrir les créances suivantes:

a) les salaires, primes d'heures supplémentaires, commissions et autres formes de rétribution, au titre du travail effectué au cours d'une période déterminée précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi; cette période devrait être fixée par la législation nationale et ne devrait pas être inférieure à douze mois;

b) les congés payés dus en raison du travail effectué dans le courant de l'année dans laquelle est survenue l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi, ainsi que dans l'année précédente;

c) les montants dus au titre d'autres absences rémunérées, les primes de fin d'année et autres primes prévues par la législation nationale, les conventions collectives ou les contrats individuels de travail, afférents à une période déterminée, qui ne devrait pas être inférieure à douze mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi;

d) tout paiement dû en lieu et place du préavis de licenciement;

e) les indemnités de départ, les indemnités de licenciement injustifié et autres paiements dus aux travailleurs à l'occasion de la cessation de leur relation d'emploi;

f) les indemnisations relatives aux accidents du travail et aux maladies professionnelles lorsqu'elles sont à la charge directe de l'employeur.

(2) La protection conférée par un privilège pourrait couvrir les créances suivantes:

a) les cotisations dues au titre des régimes légaux nationaux de sécurité sociale, lorsque le défaut de versement de ces cotisations porte préjudice aux droits des travailleurs;

b) les cotisations dues au titre des régimes privés, professionnels, interprofessionnels ou d'entreprise, de protection sociale qui existent indépendamment des régimes légaux nationaux de sécurité sociale, lorsque le défaut de versement de ces cotisations porte préjudice aux droits des travailleurs;

c) les prestations auxquelles les travailleurs avaient droit, avant l'insolvabilité, en vertu de leur participation à des régimes d'entreprise de protection sociale et dont le paiement incombe à l'employeur.

(3) Les créances énumérées aux sous-paragraphes (1) et (2), qui ont été reconnues au travailleur, par décision judiciaire ou sentence arbitrale, rendue dans les douze mois précédant l'insolvabilité, devraient être couvertes par le privilège, nonobstant les délais prévus dans ces sous-paragraphes.

LIMITATIONS

4. Lorsque le montant de la créance protégée en vertu d'un privilège est limité par la législation nationale, ce montant devrait, pour ne pas devenir inférieur à un seuil socialement acceptable, tenir compte de variables telles que le salaire minimum ou la fraction insaisissable du salaire ou le salaire qui sert de base de calcul aux cotisations à la sécurité sociale ou le salaire moyen dans l'industrie.

CLAIMS WHICH FALL DUE AFTER THE INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS HAVE BEEN OPENED

5. Where, in accordance with national laws and regulations, an enterprise in respect of which insolvency proceedings have been opened is authorised to continue its activities, workers' claims arising out of work performed as from the date when the continuation was authorised should not be subject to the proceedings and should be paid, out of the funds available, as and when they fall due.

ACCELERATED PAYMENT PROCEDURES

6. (1) Where the insolvency proceedings cannot ensure rapid payment of workers' privileged claims, there should be a procedure for accelerated payment to ensure that the claims are paid, without awaiting the end of the proceedings, out of available funds or as soon as funds become available, unless the rapid payment of workers' claims is ensured by a guarantee institution.

(2) Accelerated payment of workers' claims may be ensured as follows:

(a) the person or institution responsible for administering the employer's assets should pay such claims as soon as it has been determined that they are genuine and payable;

(b) if the claim is contested, the worker should be able to have its validity determined by a court or any other body with jurisdiction over the matter, so as to have it paid in accordance with clause (a).

(3) The accelerated payment procedure should cover the totality of the claim protected by a privilege, or at least a part of it to be fixed by national laws or regulations.

III. PROTECTION OF WORKERS' CLAIMS BY A GUARANTEE INSTITUTION

SCOPE

7. The protection of workers' claims by a guarantee institution should have as wide a coverage as possible.

OPERATING PRINCIPLES

8. Guarantee institutions might operate according to the following principles:

(a) they should be administratively, financially and legally independent of the employer;

(b) employers should contribute to financing these institutions, unless this is fully covered by the public authorities;

(c) they should assume their obligations vis-à-vis protected workers irrespective of whether any obligation the employer may have of contributing to their financing has been met;

(d) they should assume a subsidiary responsibility for the liabilities of insolvent employers in respect of claims protected by the guarantee and should, by way of subrogation, be able to act in place of the workers to whom they have made payments;

(e) the funds managed by guarantee institutions, other than those from general revenues, may only be used for the purpose for which they were collected.

CRÉANCES ÉCHUES APRÈS LA DATE DE L'OUVERTURE DE LA PROCÉDURE D'INSOLVABILITÉ

5. Lorsque, en vertu de la législation nationale, l'entreprise faisant l'objet d'une procédure d'insolvabilité est autorisée à poursuivre ses activités, les créances des travailleurs au titre du travail effectué à partir de la date où cette continuation a été décidée ne devraient pas être soumises à la procédure et devraient être payées à leur échéance sur les fonds disponibles.

PROCÉDURES DE PAIEMENT ACCÉLÉRÉ

6. (1) Lorsque la procédure d'insolvabilité ne permet pas d'assurer le paiement rapide des créances privilégiées des travailleurs, il devrait exister une procédure de paiement accéléré afin qu'elles soient payées sans attendre la fin de la procédure d'insolvabilité sur les fonds disponibles, ou qui viendraient à rentrer, à moins que le paiement rapide des créances des travailleurs ne soit assuré par une institution de garantie.

(2) Le paiement accéléré des créances des travailleurs pourrait être assuré comme suit:

a) la personne ou l'institution chargée d'administrer le patrimoine de l'employeur devrait payer lesdites créances sitôt établies leur authenticité et leur exigibilité;

b) en cas de contestation, le travailleur devrait pouvoir faire établir la validité de sa créance par un tribunal ou par tout autre organisme compétent en la matière pour en obtenir le paiement conformément à l'alinéa a).

(3) La procédure de paiement accéléré devrait pouvoir bénéficier à la totalité de la créance protégée par un privilège, ou au moins à une partie de celle-ci qui serait fixée par la législation nationale.

III. PROTECTION DES CRÉANCES DES TRAVAILLEURS PAR UNE INSTITUTION DE GARANTIE

CHAMP D'APPLICATION

7. L'étendue de la protection des créances des travailleurs par une institution de garantie devrait être aussi large que possible.

PRINCIPES DE FONCTIONNEMENT

8. Les institutions de garantie pourraient fonctionner selon les principes suivants:

a) elles devraient jouir de l'autonomie administrative, financière et juridique à l'égard de l'employeur;

b) les employeurs devraient contribuer au financement, à moins que celui-ci ne soit assuré intégralement par les pouvoirs publics;

c) elles devraient assumer leurs obligations à l'égard des travailleurs protégés, que l'employeur se soit ou non acquitté de ses obligations éventuelles de contribuer à leur financement;

d) elles devraient assumer à titre subsidiaire les obligations des employeurs insolvables en ce qui concerne les créances protégées par la garantie et pouvoir se subroger dans les droits des travailleurs à qui elles ont versé des prestations;

e) les fonds gérés par les institutions de garantie, autres que les fonds provenant du Trésor public, ne pourraient être utilisés que pour les buts pour lesquels ils ont été collectés.

CLAIMS PROTECTED BY THE GUARANTEE

9. (1) The guarantee should cover the following claims:

(a) wages, overtime pay, commissions and other forms of remuneration relating to work performed during a prescribed period, which should not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(b) holiday pay due as a result of work performed during the year in which the insolvency or the termination of the employment occurred, and in the preceding year;

(c) end-of-year and other bonuses provided for by national laws or regulations, collective agreements or individual contracts of employment, relating to a prescribed period, which should not be less than 12 months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(d) amounts due in respect of other types of paid absence relating to a prescribed period, which should not be less than three months, prior to the insolvency or prior to the termination of the employment;

(e) payments due in lieu of notice of termination of employment;

(f) severance pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other payments due to workers upon termination of their employment;

(g) compensation payable directly by the employer in respect of occupational accidents and diseases.

(2) The guarantee might cover the following claims:

(a) contributions due in respect of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(b) contributions due in respect of private, occupational, inter-occupational, or enterprise social protection schemes independent of national statutory social security schemes, where failure to pay adversely affects workers' entitlements;

(c) benefits to which the workers were entitled prior to the insolvency by virtue of their participation in enterprise social protection schemes and which are payable by the employer;

(d) wages or any other form of remuneration consistent with this Paragraph, awarded to a worker through adjudication or arbitration within three months prior to the insolvency.

LIMITATIONS

10. Where the amount of the claim protected by means of a guarantee institution is limited, in order that this amount should not fall below a socially acceptable level, it should take into account variables such as the minimum wage, the part of the wage which is unattachable, the wage on which social security contributions are based or the average wage in industry.

IV. PROVISION COMMON TO PARTS II AND III

11. Workers or their representatives should receive timely information and be consulted with regard to insolvency proceedings which have been opened and to which the workers' claims pertain.

CRÉANCES PROTÉGÉES PAR LA GARANTIE

9. (1) La garantie devrait protéger les créances suivantes:

a) les salaires, primes d'heures supplémentaires, commissions et autres formes de rétribution du travail au titre du travail effectué au cours d'une période déterminée, qui ne devrait pas être inférieure à trois mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi;

b) les congés payés dus en raison du travail effectué dans le courant de l'année dans laquelle est survenue l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi ainsi que dans l'année précédente;

c) les primes de fin d'année et autres primes prévues par la législation nationale, les conventions collectives ou les contrats individuels de travail, afférentes à une période déterminée, qui ne devrait pas être inférieure à douze mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi;

d) les montants dus au titre d'autres absences rémunérées afférentes à une période déterminée, qui ne devrait pas être inférieure à trois mois, précédant l'insolvabilité ou la cessation de la relation d'emploi;

e) tout paiement dû en lieu et place du préavis de licenciement;

f) les indemnités de départ, les indemnités de licenciement injustifié et autres paiements dus aux travailleurs à l'occasion de la cessation de leur relation d'emploi;

g) les indemnisations relatives aux accidents du travail et aux maladies professionnelles lorsqu'elles sont à la charge directe de l'employeur.

(2) La garantie pourrait protéger les créances suivantes;

a) les cotisations dues au titre des régimes légaux nationaux de sécurité sociale lorsque le défaut de versement de ces cotisations porte préjudice aux droits des travailleurs;

b) les cotisations dues au titre des régimes privés, professionnels, interprofessionnels ou d'entreprise, de protection sociale, qui existent indépendamment des régimes légaux nationaux de sécurité sociale lorsque le défaut de versement de ces cotisations porte préjudice aux droits des travailleurs;

c) les prestations auxquelles les travailleurs avaient droit, avant l'insolvabilité, en vertu de leur participation à des régimes d'entreprise de protection sociale et dont le paiement incombe à l'employeur;

d) les salaires ou toute autre forme de rémunération compatible avec ce paragraphe, reconnus à un travailleur par décision judiciaire ou sentence arbitrale rendue dans les trois mois précédant l'insolvabililté.

LIMITATIONS

10. Lorsque le montant de la créance protégée par une institution de garantie est limité, ce montant devrait, pour ne pas devenir inférieur à un seuil socialement acceptable, tenir compte de variables telles que le salaire minimum, ou la fraction insaisissable du salaire, ou le salaire qui sert de base de calcul aux cotisations à la sécurité sociale, ou le salaire moyen dans l'industrie.

IV. Disposition commune aux parties II et III

11. Les travailleurs ou leurs représentants devraient recevoir des informations en temps utile et être consultés au sujet des procédures d'insolvabilité qui ont été ouvertes et concernent les créances des travailleurs.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE

I

Resolution concerning the procedure at the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences provided for in the 1992-93 budget, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to introduce certain other changes for the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences Convened by the International Labour Organisation, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a possible revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorises the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules,

(a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;

(b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3, of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;

(c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;

(d) to authorise, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;

(e) to suspend the requirement that reports on technical items on the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;

(f) to reduce the time-limit for addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes.

II

Resolution concerning adjustment and human resources development[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having taken note of Report VI on adjustment and human resources development:

1. Adopts the following conclusions;

2. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General:

(a) to bring these conclusions to the attention of member States and of employers' and workers' organisations;

---

[1] Adopted on 4 June 1992.

[2] Adopted on 23 June 1992.

(b) to take these conclusions into account in preparing future activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Conclusions concerning adjustment and human resources development

INTRODUCTION

1. All countries need to pursue policies that enable adjustment to the changing conditions of an interdependent world economy. Such policies should contribute to an international effort to promote growth, increase investment and overcome the debt crisis. There can, of course, be no general or universal prescription for the achievement of these goals; each country's situation is different and policies need to be designed that are specific to national problems and perspectives. For example, rising interest rates have had a particularly adverse impact on developing countries. Countries at all levels of development, however, have been reviewing and changing policies that have led to stagnation, unemployment and declining competitiveness. They also have had to adjust their economic structures in response to the trend towards democracy, as well as to changes in technology, changes in international trading patterns and to new market forces. Structural adjustment is a corrective process aimed at achieving improved living standards, full employment, competitive and profitable undertakings, and sustainable, non-inflationary economic growth. The magnitude and intensity of these adjustments have varied according to the initial conditions of an economy. Economies that are competitive, and have well-functioning markets, responsive economic and social institutions, and effective social protection have tended to adjust most smoothly. Those countries without these advantages face difficult challenges of adjustment, including the need for major policy and institutional reforms as well as special policies to mitigate the social costs of adjustment. In all countries, securing the highest possible level of education and training for all workers is vital for structural adjustment as well as for economic and social progress.

2. Both the nature of adjustment and its effects differ amongst countries at different levels of development and among regions. In industrialised and newly industrialising economies, adjustment consists primarily of the adaptation of the industrial structure to technological change; improved work organisation and practices; shifts in the international division of labour; new characteristics of work; and the successful development of an entrepreneurial spirit in the economy. In transition economies, the adjustment process is more complex, involving the formulation of new policies to cope with the closure of many uncompetitive industries and the development of institutions necessary for a market economy. In developing countries, adjustment often has to be implemented against a background of a heavy burden of external debt and widespread poverty. This imposes severe constraints on their ability to bring about major reforms necessary for economic recovery and long-term growth while having at the same time to prevent an aggravation of already high levels of poverty. These countries often require external assistance to achieve the objectives of their structural adjustment programmes. Such programmes need to pay special attention to the social dimensions of adjustment and the pace and intensity of reforms have to be framed with these considerations in mind. In all countries, structural adjustment policies should be formulated in agreement with the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in 1987, which suggested, among other things, appropriate measures to encourage sustained, non-inflationary growth, increase the adaptability of the labour force and economic enterprise, overcome the debt burden of developing countries, promote international trade, stimulate fuller employment, promote dialogue and cooperation with employers' and workers' organisations, reduce poverty and mobilise the support of international organisations to facilitate action by governments to these ends.

3. In this context, the conclusions of the ILO's High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment need to be re-emphasised. In particular, it is important to recall the principles which should guide the formulation and implementation of structural adjustment programmes. These include: the need to protect the poorest and most vulnerable groups from the negative effects of adjustment programmes; the maintenance and extension of an open world trading system recognising that protectionism in all its various forms delays needed adjustment; the need to reduce debt; the promotion of tripartite consultation and cooperation; respect for basic ILO standards; and the promotion of collective bargaining.

4. Adjustment programmes should be implemented on the basis of full respect for democratic principles, human rights and social consensus. They should also attempt to ensure a fair distribution of the costs and rewards of the process of adjustment. Successful adjustment requires policies that are complementary and economically, politically and socially sustainable. Labour standards should not be violated and changes in these standards should be introduced only after full tripartite consultations on the issue. Every effort should be made to prevent any excessive widening of social inequalities.

5. Education and training are preconditions for achieving economic growth and vital ingredients for the success of adjustment programmes. In addition, they enhance the ability of enterprises to respond more effectively to their customers' needs. The education process, for which governments have the primary responsibility, should have as one of its main outputs an increase in the ability and motivation of all individuals to learn and to acquire the level of education necessary to play a full and active part in the democratic process. By providing workers with the skills required in new industries education and training support the growth of these industries while at the same time facilitating the redeployment of redundant workers. In addition, by upgrading the skills of the workforce, training enhances the capacity of an economy to adopt new technologies and new forms of work organisation, thereby raising the productivity and international competitiveness of industries. Training can also make a crucial contribution to enterprise creation, including productive and freely chosen self-employment, a strategic component of economic growth.

6. Raising the general level of education and improving basic skills such as literacy, numeracy, problem-solving ability and communication skills are important social and economic objectives. Governments should consequently endeavour to ensure universal free access to basic education since this is a fundamental human right and an obligation of government. Workers should also be given opportunities for personal development, education and skill upgrading at appropriate stages in their working lives. Education and training also contribute importantly to the attainment of social objectives such as the advance of democracy, broader social participation, greater industrial democracy, improved industrial relations and social stability. Well-educated and trained workers are more employable, better equipped to assume responsibility and accountability, more easily change jobs, and are better able to participate effectively in the affairs of enterprises and society.

7. To realise these potential benefits, education and training policies have to be guided by several important considerations. One basic requirement is that the education and training system should be flexible and responsive to changing labour market conditions. This maximises both the individual and social benefits derived from investments in education and training. Individuals find employment appropriate to their skills, enterprises obtain the types of workers they need and society benefits from fuller employment and higher productivity. However, education and training policies also have to meet important social objectives. Consequently, market forces should not be the only determinant of the educational and training needs of society. These needs should be defined through a democratic process that takes full account of the long-term goals of society, the development of national culture and the preferences of individuals. Equitable and non-discriminatory access to training opportunities is a precondition for equal employment opportunities. Training is also a potentially powerful instrument for improving the integration of disadvantaged groups into economic and social life. Training policies focused on women, the poor, the unemployed, older workers, youth, minority groups and disabled persons can significantly enhance their employability. Training in occupational safety and health is an important component of an integrated national training programme.

8. Structural adjustment programmes, especially in their early phase, have often caused declines in levels of economic activity, lower tax receipts and reductions in government expenditures. As a result, many countries have been forced to cut their public expenditures, including expenditures on education and training. The results of those cuts have often been negative, contributing to the erosion of countries' endowment of skills and knowledge and thereby jeopardising their prospects of recovery and sustained, long-term economic development. In some circumstances, budget cuts for education and training may have disproportionately affected poorer groups who have seen their access to education and training and prospects for future employment and income earning opportunities reduced. In some countries, the lack of appropriate investments in education and training and the failure to encourage investment, especially in skill-intensive industry, have contributed to the increase in the number of low-skilled, low-wage jobs and to job loss.

9. It is important for governments to avoid these negative effects and to strengthen the positive contribution that education and training can make to support successful adjustment. Education provides the general literacy, numeracy, communication, scientific and problem-solving skills that improve the individual's ability to adapt to change and learn new skills. Training, when responsive to the changing needs of the labour market, can facilitate the adjustment process by equipping workers with the specific skills needed to shift from declining to expanding sectors of economic activity. It can provide skills necessary to become productively self-employed. By raising the productivity and adaptability of workers, education and training increase enterprises' competitiveness and their ability to adjust to rapidly changing markets and consumer preferences. By increasing the occupational, regional and functional mobility of workers, education and training increase the efficiency of labour markets and allow workers to orient themselves vocationally and choose jobs in which they will be most productive. Experience shows that investments in a good educational system, followed by appropriate training efforts for workers, when combined with appropriate national policies and enterprise structures, contribute significantly to rapid economic and social development, even in circumstances when natural resources are limited. Education and training therefore constitute an essential element in a virtuous circle consisting of training and skill development, higher work motivation, higher productivity, continuous adjustment of enterprises and workers to change, higher employment and increased incomes and well-being.

10. Governments should have the political will to mobilise all appropriate human, material and financial resources to reverse the negative impact that stabilisation and adjustment have had on education and training in many countries. For example, the reduction of military spending should enable governments to channel substantial resources to productive and socially beneficial activities, such as education and training. Improved targeting and greater cost-effectiveness in the use of public expenditures will also make an important contribution to boosting education and training programmes to adequate levels. Governments should mobilise resources for education and training on the grounds of both equity and impact on the economy: equity because the burden of adjustment should not fall disproportionately on the least educated and least able to pay, and economically because increased investment in human resources would have an expansionary effect on the economy and increase the availability of skills. Where cost recovery measures have been introduced the effect has often been to limit the access of low-income groups to education and training. Safeguards should therefore be established to ensure that the fees charged do not constitute an insurmountable barrier to the poor.

11. The mobilisation of non-governmental sources of funding for education and training should be given high priority. Adjustment has encouraged a variety of actors, including enterprises, trade unions, national and local governments, non-governmental organisations and community groups, to develop innovative responses to the need for education and training in order to cope with adjustment.

Government and the social partners should encourage enterprises to engage in business-education partnerships, promote community training institutions and undertake other activities conducive to expanding access to training opportunities. Education and training institutions should be encouraged to support adjustment by expanding their training programmes for business creation and promotion and distance learning. Employers, workers and, where appropriate, their representative organisations should cooperate in establishing comprehensive training programmes, including improvements of existing schemes.

12. The use of low-cost, innovative training methods offers another means of maximising the impact of limited training resources and overcoming the effects of budgetary restrictions. Most conventional training methods are expensive for developing countries and can reach only a small proportion of the population needing access to education and training. Large numbers of workers in the urban informal and rural sectors, as well as the growing number of unemployed workers, require access to training in order to improve their situation. Governments, enterprises, education and training institutions, workers' and employers' organisations and other training providers should therefore give priority to developing and disseminating low-cost training methods that save on scarce resources without compromising the quality of training. These would include audio-visual training methods, training by correspondence, distance learning and new, cost-effective instructional technologies.

COMPREHENSIVE HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT POLICIES

13. Comprehensive human resource development policies should be formulated by governments in consultation with the social partners. Governments and the social partners may consider vesting in a tripartite national training authority or other nationwide board the tasks of formulating and reviewing national training policies. A basic objective should be to promote the creation of an institutional framework and infrastructure for implementing these policies.

14. Comprehensive human resources policies should be formulated and implemented within the framework of adherence to democratic principles, tripartism, and consultation between the government, the social partners and community groups. This will ensure maximum popular support for these policies and create a collective ownership of solutions to problems of training and skill development.

15. Under the overall umbrella of comprehensive human resources development policies, a new division of roles in training should be envisaged among governments, training institutions and the social partners. It is incumbent on governments to create an economic and social climate favourable to learning and skill development, as well as to ensure basic education and training. Governments are responsible for providing the economic and social framework that promotes long-term growth. They should make training policy and investments in education and training an integral element of long-term strategic planning and economic policy-making. Governments should mobilise public and private resources for education and training and create a supportive policy environment that encourages enterprises, training institutions and other actors to invest in training and that promotes and supports the individual's desire for learning and skill development.

16. In the context of comprehensive human resources policies, governments should ensure an effective and supportive infrastructure for training. This infrastructure should be capable of responding quickly to the specific needs of local labour markets by promoting training that meets the demand of enterprises and individuals for skills and employment-related qualifications. Governments should maintain a system of certification of skills and accreditation of institutions in order to ensure the quality and comparability of training. They should also define the desired core competencies required for improved economic and enterprise performance and ensure that vocational qualifications provide links to career advancement by giving workers access to higher levels of education. Governments should provide incentives for firms and individuals to engage in training activities, offer vocational guidance and counselling services, and also provide training support to small and medium-sized firms and the self-employed, often lacking the resources to organise and finance their own training. While preserving their role as catalyst and regulator of national laws affecting training, they may, where adequate alternatives exist, consider reducing their role in providing training programmes.

17. Structural and technological change creates demand for new skills and make it necessary to develop new forms of training. Training and education in today's rapidly changing labour markets cannot take place only in schools and training institutions. Theoretical instruction combined with practical training is widely recognised as an effective means of facilitating the transition between school and the world of work. There is therefore a need increasingly to make use of the enterprises that are capable of organising this kind of training. It is also important to exploit innovative training schemes that in various forms combine school-based education with practical training and which offer a variety of choices in career and skill development. The best prospects for adapting training is therefore in the development of various links between schools, public and private training institutions and enterprises.

18. An important objective of human resources development policies should be to make training respond better to the demand for skills and knowledge of the economy, enterprises and individuals. This can be achieved by strengthening tripartite consultations on training objectives and content, decentralising training decisions from central training authorities to regional and local community bodies and by linking enterprises, unions and training institutions in activities related to curriculum development, enrolment planning, vocational guidance and student placement. These measures are likely to improve the ability of training institutions and individual programme managers to adjust their training programmes to enterprises' and the economy's needs for skills and qualifications. They are also likely to contribute to greater equity in access to education and training.

19. Successful adjustment depends on improved company performance, which cannot be achieved without a more skilled workforce and the creation of an enterprise culture that can harness the creative and productive potential of workers and prepare them for change. It can be promoted by enterprise reforms that would increase staff participation in matters affecting their daily work, improve work organisation and practices and promote positive attitudes to change. In particular, education and training to upgrade staff skills will contribute to breaking down those hierarchical working relations that stifle initiative and prevent mobility and career advancement. The social partners should pursue these objectives through negotiations and improve wages and working conditions as a consequence.

20. Enterprises benefit greatly from training and have a responsibility to make a financial contribution to its costs. Many experiences around the world demonstrate that there are several ways in which governments can encourage enterprises to improve the quantity and quality of training. Measures which have been introduced successfully in different countries include levy schemes on enterprise payrolls to finance training, tax rebates based on expenses incurred in training, subsidising part of training costs, and the channelling of public funds through national, regional and local bodies on which the social partners are represented. It is also argued that, if properly managed, a levy can contribute to a more equitable sharing of the costs of training, raise employers' awareness about the importance of training for enterprise success and encourage them to review their investments and provisions for training. In undertaking these measures governments should ensure that they are not just financing bureaucratic institutions, but that funding is effectively used to promote skill development activities for enterprises. Governments can encourage employers to undertake training through financing innovative promotion schemes, workplace reforms, training awards, and the exchange of information about best practices in training.

21. Policy-makers, training institutions and enterprises require accurate, up-to-date information about the demand for and supply of skills in order to design relevant training programmes. Training institutions, the social partners and policy-makers should collaborate in developing such information systems. Regular surveys of skill needs should be instituted to support the planning of training and retraining programmes and to increase labour capabilities.

CONTAINING THE SOCIAL COSTS OF ADJUSTMENT

22. In developing countries undergoing structural adjustment, the initial phase is often associated with recession; a consequent rise in unemployment; a decline in real wages and the earnings of the self-employed; and reduced social expenditures. This is often exacerbated by the retrenchment of civil servants and employees of state enterprises as a result of cuts in public budgets and the phasing out of unprofitable state enterprises. These developments can be of long duration in cases where structural adjustment measures are ineffective, incomplete or are slow in producing the anticipated revival of economic growth. In these circumstances, special measures should be considered to mitigate the social costs of adjustment. These measures include the retraining of retrenched workers; the promotion of productive and freely chosen self-employment through training, credit and other support programmes; and targeted social assistance for the most vulnerable.

23. In many developing countries such measures are part of structural adjustment programmes and are usually implemented through social funds which are partly financed by external assistance. While this is a welcome development, there is significant room for improvement. The resources available under such social funds are often meagre in relation to the scale of the needs. Increased external assistance is called for, especially in the case of least developed countries. Where the social costs of adjustment are particularly acute, it may be necessary to reconsider the pace of implementation of certain aspects of structural adjustment programmes.

24. These social funds are normally implemented without the involvement of the social partners. They can be made more effective, more relevant and enjoy wider support if the social partners are consulted in their management. Tripartite consultations on programme priorities, project design, implementation and evaluation will ensure greater sensitivity to the needs of potential beneficiaries and result in more participative forms of programme implementation. In addition, national tripartite consultation on the design of overall structural adjustment programmes would make a significant contribution to minimising the social costs of structural adjustment.

25. Active policies focused on vulnerable groups and depressed regions should be implemented in all countries undergoing economic restructuring. The loss of unproductive jobs is an inevitable consequence of economic restructuring and anticipatory policies for retraining and redeployment of displaced workers should constitute an integral part of adjustment programmes. Retraining programmes must respond to the new demands in the labour market and the intervention must be as early as possible and accompanied by a full range of services such as assistance in job search, vocational guidance and placement. Countries that provide unemployment benefits should ensure that they provide a basic income. However, the level and duration of benefits should encourage an early return to work and thereby increase the effectiveness of retraining programmes. It is also important to integrate training and retraining policy with employment, welfare and income support policies since these policies are inter-related and should be mutually compatible and supportive.

26. Apart from government-run programmes, retraining opportunities can also be expanded by providing incentives to private enterprises to organise retraining programmes. These incentives have taken different forms in different countries, depending on national law and practice, and have included grants drawn from training levies, tax rebates and tax credits as well as relevant community-based training initiatives.

EQUITY IN TRAINING

27. Equality of access to training is a requirement for the elimination of discrimination in economic and social life. Every effort should therefore be made to ensure equitable and non-discriminatory access to training opportunities. Equity issues assume a heightened significance during structural adjustment because disadvantaged groups are particularly vulnerable to a deterioration in their economic condition and reduced opportunities for training. Special measures to prevent this are therefore required.

28. Governments have the primary responsibility for ensuring equal and non-discriminatory access to training and consequently should establish an appropriate body to ensure that this is done. Equal opportunity commissions should, where appropriate, be established. These commissions can make an important contribution to the elimination of discrimination in training and employment on the grounds of gender, religion, ethnic origins, age or disability. Such commissions can stimulate the introduction of equal opportunity legislation and monitor its enforcement. They can also promote voluntary action to reduce discrimination through funding research and action programmes in this area. Furthermore, they can undertake research to identify systemic barriers to the integration of the disadvantaged into mainstream training and employment and to formulate measures to remove these barriers.

29. In most societies, the employment opportunities for women are substantially less than those for men, and programmes to eliminate discrimination against women in education, training and employment merit special attention. A comprehensive set of measures needs to be introduced and executed to ensure gender equality. Equal opportunity legislation needs to be supplemented by measures such as the creation of equal parental rights, the provision of child-care facilities, campaigns against sexual harassment, and information programmes to change the attitudes of employers and workers and break cultural stereotypes that are detrimental to women. Special measures to promote equal access to educational and training opportunities are also important. These include the provision of vocational guidance and other measures to encourage women to enter non-traditional fields of training. The design of training programmes should make allowance for the time constraints women face because of family responsibilities.

30. Special training programmes should be provided for other disadvantaged groups such as ethnic minorities, migrant workers, older workers, marginalised youth and disabled persons. These programmes should aim at integrating such disadvantaged groups into the mainstream of economic and social life. In order to maximise their effectiveness, the design of these programmes has to take into account the special needs of particular groups. Measures such as training in language and numeracy skills may have to precede vocational training, and institutional support in the form of child-care and other facilities may be required to encourage participation. It is also desirable to design customised training initiatives based on an assessment of individual and enterprise needs. Although governments have the main responsibility for financing and organising these programmes, initiatives by employers' organisations, enterprises, trade unions, international and national NGOs and community organisations should be encouraged. Where possible these organisations should be used as implementing agencies of training programmes.

31. Among these disadvantaged groups, migrant workers deserve special attention in view of their growing numbers and the severe difficulties they face in gaining access to training opportunities. These difficulties often spring from their insecure status in host countries and their unfamiliarity with local languages and cultures.

32. Developing countries face a major challenge in extending training opportunities to large numbers of the poor, who are normally illiterate or semi-literate, in rural areas and in the urban informal sector. Intensive programmes need to be organised that involve basic literacy training and supporting measures to boost income-generating opportunities, provide basic social protection and promote collective action by informal sector producers and workers. In view of the large numbers that must be reached, audio-visual and other innovative and low-cost alternatives to conventional training programmes should be used. Special attention should be given to encouraging an entrepreneurial approach and developing the necessary skills for enterprise development.

33. Training and other programmes directed at the informal sector in developing countries should have as a basic objective the progressive integration of this sector into the formal sector. Training programmes have to be supported by the provision of basic infrastructure and credit. Special efforts should be made to remove constraints to the integration of small informal sector enterprises into the formal sector by increasing their productivity and ability to meet accepted business practices in the formal sector. Basic social protection should be provided to informal sector producers and workers placing particular emphasis on freedom of association and freedom from forced labour, the development of some elementary forms of social security, and providing information and training to informal sector enterprises on measures that can be taken to reduce exposure to occupational safety and health risks. Governments should support the initiatives to improve social protection in the informal sector undertaken by producer cooperatives, trade unions and other groupings in that sector.

ROLE OF THE SOCIAL PARTNERS

34. Employers' and workers' organisations should participate actively in the formulation of national and sectoral training policies and in the implementation of training programmes at the national, regional and local levels. Workers' organisations have a major role in encouraging their members to undertake training. Both employers' and workers' organisations have an important role to play in defining the current and future training needs of the economy and thereby ensuring that the training system is fully responsive to market needs. Employers' and workers' organisations have a contribution to make in ensuring that training policies and programmes are sensitive to training needs broader than those solely determined by the market as well as to equity issues.

35. Employers' and workers' organisations should be consulted in determining national systems of skill certification and the content of training courses. They can also contribute to the monitoring and evaluation of training policies. Of particular importance is the feedback they can provide to policy-makers on whether the current policy environment provides sufficient incentives for enterprises to train and for workers to undertake training. In addition they can provide regular feedback on performance to training institutions.

36. Employers' organisations have an important role to play in stimulating training by enterprises through the provision of information and technical services on the design and implementation of industry and plant-level courses that would facilitate the access of workers to training. These services will be particularly useful for small enterprises. Management training and entrepreneurship development programmes run or supported by employers' organisations are particularly useful additions to national training efforts. Similarly, initiatives by enterprises such as the setting up of training centres for deprived urban youth and the organisation of retraining programmes for displaced workers contribute significantly to the attainment of social objectives. Employers can also stimulate training through promoting work organisation and payments systems that value and reward skill acquisition. Collaboration between enterprises and training institutions in training initiatives should be encouraged.

37. Workers' organisations play an important role in organising training programmes for their members and in negotiating better training by enterprises, its extension to workers not adequately covered, and the provision of adequate incentives and assistance for workers to acquire additional skills. Workers' organisations can also play a very important role in providing training in occupational safety and health and in ensuring that training programmes in enterprises are sensitive to the special needs of women workers and young workers. They can also make a significant contribution to poverty alleviation through training programmes for rural and urban informal sector workers.

38. Industrial relations approaches that allow for consultation and cooperation can play an important role in facilitating the introduction of new, more flexible, forms of work organisation and production technologies that permit enterprises to adjust to rapidly changing and increasingly competitive markets; and to encourage the integration of training into the overall enterprise strategy.

ACTION BY THE ILO

39. The activities of the ILO in the promotion of human resources development must be seen in the context of national circumstances and relevant international labour standards, particularly the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 1975 (No. 150), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). They also need to be planned and developed within the framework established by the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in 1987. In addition these activities need to be sharply focused to make the best use of limited ILO resources to promote human resources development. Outputs should be assessed and the cost-effectiveness of specific activities and projects evaluated. There are four areas described in paragraphs 40-43 below which the ILO should continue to emphasise in its efforts to ensure the critical importance of human resources development in economies faced with the demands of structural adjustment. In continuing to emphasise these efforts the ILO should:

40. In respect of human resources development policies

(a) strengthen its leadership role in advocating that investment in human resources development and especially in basic education and in vocational training is a priority of governments and the social partners during structural adjustment; not only to facilitate the process of adjustment but, in addition, to ensure the equal participation of all individuals and the social groups in the labour market and to maintain or increase the skills of workers necessary for long-term economic and social development;

(b) intensify continuing dialogue between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions in order to maintain expenditures in education and training during adjustment programmes. This advocacy should be supported by in-depth analytic studies, information dissemination, advisory services and, where appropriate, participation in structural adjustment missions;

(c) encourage and facilitate consultation with the social partners when structural adjustment programmes are being designed and negotiated. The ILO should encourage and assist the social partners to participate fully in such consultations by helping them to develop their capacity to analyse structural adjustment issues within the framework of broad national social, especially educational, and economic objectives;

(d) assist governments and the social partners in designing training and retraining activities as part of programmes to compensate for the social costs of adjustment. In circumstances where many new employment opportunities are located in the informal sector, the ILO should assist member States to develop innovative, low-cost training methods for helping informal sector workers to improve their productivity and working conditions. The ILO also should prepare for policy-makers a compendium of approaches to mitigate the social costs of adjustment, particularly for use in countries in transition and in developing countries;

(e) intensify its assistance to policy-makers to improve their capacity to design training activities that are linked to and benefit from general educational programmes. The ILO also should assist the social partners in developing their own capacity to analyse adjustment;

(f) encourage and assist policy-makers to evaluate training needs and plan appropriate responses within a broad educational, economic and social framework;

(g) assist in the organisation of national tripartite conferences to evaluate adjustment programmes with a view to promoting successful responses;

(h) consider organising a follow-up meeting to the High-Level Meeting on Structural Adjustment held in 1987;

(i) give policy advice to governments, based on in-depth research concerning training and education, in line with the policy priorities identified by the conclusions of this Committee;

(j) assist member States in examining means to ensure equal access to education and training for all groups of the population.

41. In respect of national capacities to implement human resources development programmes

(a) intensify its technical cooperation programmes with developing countries and with countries shifting from centrally planned to more market-oriented economies. These technical cooperation activities normally should be managed by national organisations rather than donors and should draw on national expertise, including employers' and workers' organisations, so as to ensure enhanced national capacity and not merely the achievement of relatively narrow project objectives. In implementing technical cooperation activities, emphasis should be put on the promotion of international labour standards, tripartite cooperation, collective bargaining and safety and health in the workplace;

(b) give priority to strengthening the capacity of employers, especially in small and medium firms, to design and implement training programmes that increase the productivity of their enterprises and contribute to the personal development of their employees, particularly where such programmes are based on a strong collaborative partnership between employers and trade unions;

(c) collaborate with member States in developing guidelines, procedures and training materials that increase opportunities for productive and freely chosen self-employment and that raise the productivity of workers, especially those working in the informal sector, leading to improved wages, living and working conditions;

(d) develop a programme for promoting partnerships between education and training institutions and the social partners. This programme would, in particular, endeavour to link employers' and workers' organisations, where they exist, with such institutions in jointly developing and implementing training programmes;

(e) encourage and promote developed and developing country dialogue leading to closer cooperation, the development of the interchange of information, the transfer of technology, the provision of training programmes and skills, and the analysis of markets on a continuing basis, leading to closer forms of partnership.

42. In respect of research and information dissemination

(a) undertake applied and practical research that will assist countries to develop appropriate human resources development responses to the challenges posed by structural adjustment. For example, the ILO should compile and publicise information on the impact of various structural adjustment policies on national populations, workers, and vulnerable social groups. Secondly, given the widespread interest in finding the most effective means of encouraging employers to provide training, the ILO should conduct a comparative study of the costs and benefits of different approaches, including tax rebates, enterprise-based training levies and the channelling of public funds for training through accountable bodies in which the social partners are represented. The study should provide countries with practical means of assessing the effectiveness and relevance of these different approaches to their own particular national circumstances, and guidelines for their implementation;

(b) strengthen the capabilities of national statistical offices, national training authorities, individual training institutions and enterprises to collect and analyse data on the demand and supply of training, including training for informal sector activities. This information will provide the basis for designing and implementing training policies and programmes in support of formal and informal sector training activities so as to improve the income earning abilities, living and working conditions of producers and workers, including the strengthening and modernisation of traditional apprenticeship training;

(c) reinforce its role as an international clearing-house for the collection, analysis and dissemination of information about training policy developments, institutional reforms in training, including the effects of privatisation of training institutions, incentive systems that encourage private sector training and innovations in extending training to groups that have been particularly hard hit by structural adjustment and have limited access to training. A particularly important objective of the ILO should be to publicise innovative local approaches to human resource development by enterprises, non-governmental and community organisations, employers' organisations and trade unions, as well as activities conducted jointly by the social partners. An important means of strengthening its clearing-house role is through the establishment of networking arrangements with educational and training institutions, especially at the regional level;

(d) prepare and disseminate a synopsis of research findings of national training experiences contained in the ILO's publications on training;

(e) undertake a programme of national and regional tripartite workshops and seminars that provide opportunities for the social partners to share their experiences in human development, especially the results of innovative responses to structural adjustment. The International Training Centre of the ILO should play an important role in this area, both in the conduct of such activities, at the Centre or in the regions, and in the preparation of appropriate background and instructional materials;

(f) undertake comparative analytical studies of the institutional framework for training in different countries. These studies should identify different institutional mechanisms and policies that have been employed for adjusting training programmes to meet better enterprises' skill demand and the skill needs of the informal sector, while ensuring equity in training. They should also endeavour to identify the technical, managerial and financial means by which traditional apprenticeship training could be strengthened and modernised to meet the skill and development needs of the informal sector. Based on these evaluations effective strategies for undertaking training policy reforms should be developed.

43. In respect of special programmes

(a) exercise vigorously its unique role among international organisations as the advocate of tripartite collaboration and as champion of the most vulnerable social groups. This responsibility is greater today than ever because of the difficult world economic conditions and the necessity for many countries to undergo substantial restructuring of their economies. The ILO must continue to assert its message concerning social equity and the development and efficient utilisation of human resources both in international forums and in its collaborative activities with the Bretton Woods institutions and regional development banks. The ILO should continue to reiterate that structural adjustment should emphasise social justice and the sharing of the burdens of adjustment, the improvement in working and living conditions which will result from structural adjustment, and tripartite consultation and cooperation on adjustment to improve the probability of its success;

(b) intensify its efforts to improve opportunities for women to participate on an equal basis in all human resource development and labour market programmes. In addition, it must strengthen technical cooperation programmes that promote the full economic social equality of women and improve the working and living conditions of the poorest groups of women, especially in rural areas, who have not had the opportunity to attend school and who, in addition to family responsibilities, are burdened with heavy work responsibilities outside the home;

(c) reinforce its programmes, consistent with the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), to make sure that disabled persons, one of the most vulnerable social groups, are not unfairly impacted by structural adjustment programmes, reduction in social expenditures and privatisation. The ILO should assist countries moving to more market-oriented economies to develop policies and programmes that demonstrate methods of providing equal opportunities for disabled persons in competitive labour markets;

(d) strengthen the role of the International Training Centre of the ILO, which represents a substantial potential to advance the ILO's efforts in human resources development. The Centre should continue to intensify its programmes aimed at enhancing the capacity of training organisations to develop effective managerial and professional skills, especially through training of senior managers and trainers of trainers. The Centre should also develop innovative, low-cost instructional methods and materials for use in developing and transitional economies. The Centre has a key role to play in the functioning of information networks. Its management training and workers' education programmes should be strengthened.

III

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled: "Prevention of major industrial accidents"[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning prevention of industrial disasters,

Decides that an item entitled "Prevention of major industrial accidents" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

IV

Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth and the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the obligation of the ILO to further programmes which will achieve, inter alia, full employment, the raising of standards of living, and a just share of the fruits of progress to all,

Recalling the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169),

Recalling also the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Recalling that the standards of the ILO relating to employment address all forms of productive activity which provide means of earning a livelihood,

Considering that continuing structural adjustment in the context of technological developments and changes in world markets requires intensified efforts to maximise employment opportunities in all countries,

Recognising that a key element in solving the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human skills including entrepreneurial and management skills, and the exercise of these skills by individuals, within the framework of policies that encourage the creation and growth of enterprises, especially small and medium-sized ones, that are competitive nationally, regionally and internationally,

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1992.

Considering that there is a need for tripartite cooperation in the creation of an environment that would stimulate enterprise and investment, and through that, employment growth and improved living standards and working conditions, freedom of association and free collective bargaining,

Considering also that the full use of consultation between governments and the social partners, at all appropriate levels, greatly facilitates such cooperation and the achievement of these objectives,

Convinced of the need for government policies which provide the appropriate infrastructure and framework for economic and employment growth, investment and active labour market policies;

1. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to:

(a) promote economic, industrial, investment and employment policies, including active labour market policies, that provide an environment in which enterprise can develop and flourish and new small and medium-sized enterprises are established, so that self-sustaining new jobs, offering full, productive and freely chosen employment can be created, and living standards and working conditions can be improved;

(b) make full use of consultation in the formulation of such policies;

(c) encourage constructive industrial relations systems, including collective bargaining systems where relevant, in order to facilitate the implementation of these policies;

(d) improve employment services and training and retraining programmes;

(e) take appropriate measures to encourage an entrepreneurial approach and the necessary skills for enterprise development, in particular through training and retraining programmes;

(f) devote particular attention to measure which will assist the most marginalised sections in society, such as women and rural workers, to find employment opportunities.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the ILO to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special emphasis, when implementing the programme of the ILO and when planning future activities, to:

  (i) activities that promote the development of appropriate economic and employment policies that would:
    - encourage an entrepreneurial approach and the necessary skills for enterprise development, especially in small and medium-sized enterprises, with a view to expanding sustainable and productive employment;
    - enhance the potential of enterprise in the creation of full productive, and freely chosen employment; and
    - help to improve living standards and working conditions;

  (ii) training and retraining programmes directed towards enabling unemployed people, including new entrants to the workforce, those displaced by structural adjustment and those in marginalised sections of society, to acquire the necessary skills and qualifications to find employment or re-employment or to start their own economic activities;

  (iii) activities fostering the creation of new enterprises as a significant means of re-employing people who may lose their jobs in the process of structural adjustment, as well as providing employment for new entrants to the workforce;

(b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting as essential elements of their economic and employment policies, in order to increase opportunities for sustainable and productive employment:

  - a diversified and efficient market economy;
  - the promotion and encouragement of the creation and development of enterprises without unnecessary regulation and excessive bureaucratic interference;

- the promotion of freedom of association and free and voluntary collective bargaining;
- facilities for, and the promotion of, adequate consultations between the social partners, at all appropriate levels, on how to cope with and facilitate the implementation of structural adjustment in the labour market;
- the full incorporation of adequate social considerations into economic programmes.

V

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment",

Recalling the ILO's responsibility, according to the Declaration of Philadelphia, to promote programmes which will achieve full employment, and the fact that the Preamble to the Constitution of the Organisation advocates the prevention of unemployment and the provision of an adequate living wage, and reaffirming continuous support for the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122),

Considering that the International Labour Organisation affirmed in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "the attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy", and further affirmed that it was the responsibility of the Organisation "to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective",

Recalling the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987,

Recalling also ILO standards on employment policy,

Noting with concern the decline in employment opportunities in various regions of the world and the increase in unemployment and underemployment in several industrialised countries as well as in developing countries and countries in transition,

Recognising the need to ensure respect for the principles contained in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), and the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141),

Recognising the responsibility of governments in the field of development policy and in the promotion of an environment which stimulates growth and employment and the importance of consultation with employers' and workers' organisations in the formulation of relevant policies in these areas;

1. Urges governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to formulate and apply, as a matter of priority, an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, through sustained economic growth and development, and thereby raise the standard of living of the population;

(b) to adopt policies which encourage job-creative economic activities, in line with national policies and development criteria; to develop employment and vocational guidance services so as to facilitate access to the labour market;

(c) to continue and intensify efforts to devise coherent training systems and policies:

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1992.

(d) to develop social, employment and training programmes that would help to prepare the entry of young people into working life and the reintegration in the labour market of the long-term unemployed, workers displaced by restructuring or reconversion and workers who have interrupted their working life for various reasons, such as family responsibilities;

(e) to take appropriate measures to ensure that employment conditions in all categories of establishments respect the principles of ILO labour standards;

(f) to increase economic cooperation between countries which are at different stages of economic development;

(g) to promote long-term development of world trade on a fair basis, as a means of increasing economic activity and thus to increase employment opportunities, improve living standards and eliminate hunger and poverty;

(h) to develop a market-oriented macroeconomic environment as a means of solving problems of unemployment and developing overall growth.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) encourage member States to establish a framework for substantial employment growth, in both quantitative and qualitative terms, and to take the appropriate economic and social policy measures at the national and international levels and, for this purpose, to advise member States on the means of achieving their objectives as regards employment and the meeting of basic needs;

(b) assess the developments since the adoption of the World Employment Programme, taking especially into account the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987, and submit relevant proposals for action to the Governing Body at an early date;

(c) continue and strengthen training activities at the national and regional levels, ensuring the optimum distribution and enhanced effectiveness of these programmes;

(d) cooperate fully with other organisations of the United Nations system in the search for solutions to problems of employment and the meeting of basic needs.

VI

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their families[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Guided by the recognition in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution of the urgent need to protect the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own,

Noting the standards embodied in the relevant ILO Conventions, including the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and by the accompanying Recommendations,

Noting the resolution on migrant workers in Asia adopted by the 11th Asian Regional Conference of the ILO (Bangkok, 26 November-2 December 1991),

Recalling previous relevant resolutions concerning migrant workers adopted by the Conference in 1967 and 1971,

[1] Adopted on 22 June 1992.

Recalling also the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1990 (resolution 45/158) of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, to which the ILO made a positive contribution,

Noting the terms of the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), which calls on Members to create more employment opportunities and better conditions of work in countries of emigration so as to reduce the need to migrate to find employment, and to ensure that international migration takes place under conditions designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment,

Considering that with increasing economic integration and the movement of workers between countries, countries should consider questions relating to migrant workers and may need to cooperate more effectively in tackling any problems,

Concerned that migration can embody practices which are not in keeping with the principles embodied in relevant ILO standards and considering that there is need to ensure that the conditions of recruitment and employment of migrant workers are in line with those principles,

Expressing concern about acts of racism and xenophobia and the discrimination in employment to which migrant workers may sometimes be exposed,

Calling for effective means to eliminate illegal migration for employment, including through effective measures against labour-recruiting agents, intermediaries and employers of illegal migrant workers,

Convinced that the ILO has an important and valuable role to play in international efforts, including those of the United Nations system, concerning the welfare and the fundamental rights of all migrant workers and their families,

Stressing the need for employers' and workers' organisations to be associated, wherever relevant, in the work of all national, regional and international bodies concerned with questions affecting migrant workers and members of their families;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to take all appropriate measures to ensure that the terms and conditions of employment of migrant workers respect the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination, and the provisions of the relevant ILO instruments;

(b) to consider ratification of relevant ILO Conventions concerning the rights of migrant workers and their families;

(c) to take appropriate national measures and to cooperate effectively in the field of international assistance, designed to eradicate migrationary pressures;

(d) to take duly into account all pertinent national and international standards when concluding bilateral agreements on migration;

(e) to take appropriate action which may include legislation to combat all acts of racism and xenophobia against migrant workers, and to intensify information and educational activities to this end;

(f) to ensure that migrant workers have access to information on their rights, including, where necessary, in their own languages;

(g) to involve, through appropriate means, workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and monitoring of the effects of policies which cover recruitment, employment and the working conditions of migrant workers.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the Intenational Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make the necessary provision in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium for activities which appropriately address the need for the protection and promotion of migrant workers' rights;

(b) to present to an early session of the Governing Body a report on the conditions of migrant workers, to make proposals regarding any appropriate action to be taken when these are not in conformity with the principles embodied in relevant ILO instruments and to keep the Governing Body informed at regular intervals on matters pertaining to these issues;

(c) to continue and, where appropriate, intensify ILO cooperation with other international institutions concerned, including the International Organisation for Migration (IOM), on policies affecting migrant workers, including social and economic policies and employment creation in all countries and to consider appropriate measures to provide the necessary tripartite guidance for the ILO input in this area;

(d) to provide adequate advisory services, monitoring and technical cooperation on migration issues, with the aim of helping governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations to formulate and apply effectively policies to protect the rights of migrant workers and to promote their welfare;

(e) to promote the dissemination of information on the rights of migrant workers and members of their families that are recognised in the relevant international instruments, and specifically on their right to freedom of association;

(f) to cooperate closely with the United Nations Compensation Commission so as to ensure that the work already undertaken by the ILO to register migrant workers displaced by the Gulf conflict of 1990-91 is put to use in ensuring that proper compensation reaches the largest possible number of those with just entitlements and to draw conclusions from this experience for situations which may arise in the future;

(g) to continue to examine relevant migration issues and problems, and ways of tackling them, in all the appropriate forums of the ILO.

VII

Noting that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia in the United Nations for their periods of membership in the United Nations in 1991 and 1992 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992;

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that consideration of the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia for their periods of membership in the Organisation in 1991 and 1992, together with those of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-94 United Nations scale of assessments, be deferred to the 80th Session (June 1993) of the International Labour Conference.
